"What a lot of the other schools have done is drop [classical animation] courses, but we stuck to the Disney and Warner Bros. guidelines and just added computers," she said.

Although Schacker is thrilled with the success of the school, she still dreams that Max the Mutt Animation School could develop into an animation company with a school attached to it.

"We're working to that end. Our dream is to produce high-end animation with everything generated here, not to be a production house for companies in the U.S.," she said.

"We want to use all this wonderful Canadian talent to provide them with high quality projects to work on that will excite them and then enable them to use their capacities and be happy to stay here and not leave."

Former Canadian contests Ms. Senior America title

Ms. Senior Arizona grew up in Toronto

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Though she probably hears the joke a lot, Sharon Friendly is aptly named.

Last March, she was crowned Ms. Senior Arizona and recognized as the pageant's most elegant contestant. Her next move is to compete in November's Ms. Senior America competition.

Effervescent and bubbly on the phone at 7 a.m., the 65-year-old told The CJN she was en route to a nail appointment and then to her full-time sales-associate job in the Scottsdale Neiman Marcus department store's children's department. Friendly is the first employed Ms. Senior Arizona.

"I thought, 'Why not? I've never been in a beauty contest,'" she said about her choice to compete.

"And it's not really a beauty contest, because you don't have to wear a bathing suit, thank God," she added.

"I thought it would be a wonderful challenge and also I could share my gifts."

Friendly grew up in Toronto and has worked as a professional singer and entertainer all her life. As well, she's hosted a show in Los Angeles, Let's Get Friendly.

Representing the seniors of Arizona is a big responsibility, she said. Friendly's duties involve making appearances at retirement homes, hospitals, parades and state fairs. Seniors love to hear her sing and see her dressed elegantly, she said, because it brings back old memories. She enjoys dressing to the nines.

Friendly turned 65 on July 5 and spent her birthday in Italy with her daughter, son-in-law and two grandchildren at their home. Her son, daughter-in-law and other two grandchildren live in Toronto.

"It's so hard to believe because it sounds like such a big number. It's not a big number because I feel like I'm 25," she said. "I'm happy and healthy, and there's nothing I could want more."

Ms. Senior Arizona, Sharon Friendly

Aside from work and her Ms. Senior Arizona duties, Friendly is a cantorial soloist at the Desert Foothills Jewish Community Association in Tempe. She also belongs to Congregation Beth Israel in Scottsdale, where she sang in the choir and performed cantorial duties.

"She's such a babe, they love her," said her sister, Lynda, of Toronto, referring to Sharon's cantorial performances.

"She wears her late father's tallis," Lynda added.

Friendly said that her father didn't approve of her going into show business and wanted her to be a cantor, but did not live to see it happen.

"I'm sure he knows somewhere up there and is turning cartwheels."

Friendly is passionate about increasing child literacy. She volunteers with the Screen Actors Guild Foundation BookPALS program, in which performing artists and other volunteers go into schools and read to students. She also records stories for children who phone in to listen.

During the Ms. Senior Arizona pageant, Friendly sang Don't Rain on My Parade for the show's talent portion and had to present a life philosophy.

The last portion of this philosophy speaks to a dark chapter in the cheerful senior's life.

"I believe you have to live your life. I'm a survivor. Don't regret what might have been, accept what is and rejoice in what is yet to be," she said.

In January 1994, in Los Angeles, 24 hours before the Northridge earthquake hit the city, Friendly was raped and robbed at knife point. She was working as a model at a downtown auto show.

At the same time, Let's Get Friendly had featured a segment on the homeless. Friendly hired a homeless couple to drive her to the auto show so she wouldn't have to go alone at night.

"I wanted to give them a new start in life," she said.

One night, when they picked Friendly up, she noticed the drivers had changed places. The woman was driving and the man sat in the back.

What followed were "3½ hours of unspeakable horror," Friendly said, during which the man raped her three times. She was tied up and gagged in the backseat, and a third person came into the car to appraise her jewelry.

"The police told me that because I was very quiet and acquiescent I was able to get through what I got through," she said.

She finally persuaded the couple to let her go. After going to the police with her story and identifying the pair, whom she had interviewed on her show and invited into her home, the case went to trial and they were both convicted.

It turned out they were not a couple, but a man and an accomplice. The man was a wanted murderer and serial rapist, who is now serving a 102-consecutive-year prison sentence, and the accomplice was sent to jail for five years.

"It took me a long time to get comfortable with it and know that it wasn't my fault, that I didn't lead these people on," Friendly said.

She wanted to continue her work at the auto show, but said that for a long time she "was scared beyond anything" she has ever known.

Friendly turned her experience into a positive. She discussed it on her show and taught women how to protect themselves.

Her son, whom she had been estranged from for 22 years, saw her tell her story on America's Most Wanted and contacted her.

"He came back into my life and that's a wonderful positive," she said.

Now, Friendly is gearing up for the Ms. Senior America competition in Las Vegas.

She is anticipating what she said will be the "most wonderful experience in the world." One day, she said, she wants to write a book about her experience in the competition.

She said participating in the pageant counters the loss of confidence some women go through as they age.

"If you're going to mature, you might as well do it while wearing a tiara."

Chefs' advice makes for great tastes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israeli master chefs Arik Porat and Oved Alfia brought a true taste of Israel to the Park Hyatt this past winter as part of a 10-city Canadian culinary tour sponsored by the Jewish National Fund.

The culinary event was the cumulation of JNF's Tu b'Shvat celebrations. Funds raised were to be directed to the replanting and reforestation program in those areas of the Galilee that were so adversely affected by Katyusha rockets during the Second Lebanon War last year.

The chefs, executive chefs at Dan Hotels, along with Nati Benaim of the Dan Acadia Hotels and Joan Monfaredi of the Park Hyatt, created a seven-course dinner that included grilled eggplant, halibut cake in savoury pickled lemon sauce, five herbs soup with egg ravioli, young chicken skewer, tomato granite, citrus herb braised short rib, and vanilla and cardamom poached pear for dessert.

Bonnie Stern, a local chef and cookbook author who has led two culinary tours to Israel along with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, was master of ceremonies.

In a colourful booklet of recipes excerpted from a soon-to-be-published cookbook titled The Book of New Israeli Foods: A Culinary Journey, Stern writes that she went to Israel for the first time about four years ago, also with Rabbi Goldstein.

"She kept telling me not to expect too much in the way of food, and I kept reassuring her that I wasn't going for the food. I was going to learn about the culture…

"As we ate falafel at a roadside stand on the way to Haifa, had hummus in the Arab market in the Old City of Jerusalem, enjoyed a Sephardi Shabbat dinner at a hotel in Jerusalem and were wowed by a biblical feast cooked by an award winning chef, I knew food was the reason I would come back again and again."

SIMPLE SHAKSHUKA

This is the basic version found in most workers' kitchens. Shakshuka aficionados will opt for more elaborate versions.

4 tbsp. oil, for frying
2 cloves garlic, crushed
5 large, ripe tomatoes, peeled and diced (or 1½ cups canned diced tomatoes) ½ tbsp. red hot pepper)
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste ½ tsp. ground cumin (optional)
a pinch of ground caraway seed (optional)
2 tbsp. tomato paste
8 eggs

Heat the oil in a skillet and lightly fry the garlic, taking care not to scorch it. Add the tomatoes and seasoning and cook for 15 to 20 minutes at low heat, partly covered. Add the tomato paste, simmer for a few more minutes with the lid on and adjust the seasoning – the sauce should have a strong, piquant flavour.

Break the eggs one by one and slide onto the tomato base. Turn heat to low and cook until the egg whites have set (5-7 minutes). Partly cover to prevent the sauce from spraying. Cover completely if you like your eggs "over hard." Serves 4.

Shakshuka with onions and peppers: Slice one onion and two red peppers into strips and fry lightly. Add the garlic and tomatoes and continue according to the basic recipe.

Shakshuka with sausages: Lightly fry sliced merguez sausages or small cocktail sausages (or grill the sausages first and then add to the pan). Add the garlic and tomatoes and continue according to the basic recipe.

TABULEH

A delicious Arab salad made of bulgar wheat and fresh vegetables. Instant couscous (coarse) may be used instead of the bulgar wheat.

1 cup coarsely ground bulgar wheat, soaked in water for 30 minutes and drained
2 cups parsley leaves, chopped
1 red onion, chopped
2 tomatoes, peeled and chopped (optional)
1 green pepper, chopped
1-2 tbsp. lemon juice
3 tbsp. aromatic extra virgin olive oil
1 pinch ground allspice
1 pinch ground cinnamon
1 tsp. sumac (optional)
salt to taste

To serve:
⅔ cup pomegranate kernels

Mix all ingredients and set aside for 30 minutes to allow the flavours to settle (do not refrigerate). Add the pomegranate kernels, toss lightly and serve. Serves 4.

SPICY MOROCCAN CARROT SALAD

8-10 carrots, peeled
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 tsp. cayenne pepper
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 tbsp. oil
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. ground cumin
chopped parsley
2 tsp. Zhug hot sauce (optional)

Cook the carrots in boiling water for about 30 minutes or until tender. Allow to cool and slice into coins. Mix the remaining ingredients, pour over the carrot slices and mix well. Let stand for a minimum of one hour. Serves 6-8.

PICKLED TURNIP AND BEETROOT

3-4 beetroots, peeled and sliced
4-5 turnips, peeled and sliced

Chefs Arik Porat and Oved Alfia

1 tsp. salt

Place the turnip slices on a kitchen towel for one hour and allow to dry. Dissolve the salt in 3 cups of water. Arrange the turnip slices in a jar, place the beetroots on top and pour brine over everything. Close the lid tight and leave in a cool shaded place for one week. Will fill a 1-litre/1-quart jar.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Diversity and destruction

By RABBI AARON LEVY

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

It is commonly known that Jews will commemorate the destruction of the Second Temple this coming Tuesday with the fast of Tisha b'Av.

What's less known is that the period prior to the destruction featured great variety in Jewish life: there were multiple, competing groups with widely diverging ideologies on the most fundamental matters in Jewish belief and practice, including Sadducees, Pharisees, and Essenes, among others. Of course, there were also plenty of ordinary Jews not affiliated with any sect.

Sound familiar?

So how did the rabbis of late antiquity view this Jewish diversity? They could have cast the sects that they disagreed with in the harshest light – as idolatrous and, therefore, the spiritual cause of the imminent Roman devastation of the Temple. After all, the sages do attribute the First Temple's destruction to the idol worship, sexual depravity, and violence of the Jews of that time (586 BCE).

But their assessment of the causes for the Second Temple's destruction (70 CE) is quite different.

"Rabbi Yochanan ben Torta said: 'But with the Second Temple, we acknowledge that the people studied Torah and were circumspect with their tithes, so why were they exiled? Because they loved money and hated each other'" (Tosefta, Tractate Menachot 13:22).

Instead of seeing the mere existence of multiple Jewish ideologies as catastrophic, our tradition sees the sinat chinam – senseless hatred – that Jews harboured for each other as the underlying cause of utter calamity.

Other rabbinic sources further impress this point. The midrashic work Tanna de-Vei Eliyahu depicts conversations between the prophet Elijah and Rabbi Anan. In one discussion, the latter asks: "My teacher, why did the first exile end, while the second exile continues?" The prophet answers: "My son, although the Jews at the time of the First Temple were idolaters, they possessed derech eretz – civility."

If senseless hatred lies at the root of such massive Jewish tragedy, but civility is able to mitigate even the destructive power of idolatry, it's obviously crucial that we strive for civility. What would this look like?

Our tradition has an excellent model for positive and respectful interaction with all Jews: the figure of Hillel the Elder (first century BCE). While there are many inspiring stories about Hillel, I'll share just one, which sums up many of his qualities.

"Rabbi Abba said in the name of Samuel: Beit [the house/school of] Shammai and Beit Hillel debated for three years [!], one asserting, 'The halachah follows our views,' and the other asserting, 'The halachah follows our views.' Then a Heavenly Voice issued forth and proclaimed, 'These and these are the words of the living God, but the halachah follows Beit Hillel.'"

If the rulings of both schools are equally validated by God, why should Hillel's decisions prevail? The Talmud answers: "Because they were kind and modest, they studied their own rulings and those of Beit Shammai, and they even put the rulings of Beit Shammai before their own." (Tractate Eiruvin, p. 13b)

The organization for which I work is named for Hillel because he embodied the values of limitless kindness, openness, and respectfulness. As a pluralistic Jewish organization dedicated to engaging and empowering young Jews to explore Jewish life in numerous, varied ways, our name reminds us to aspire to emulate Hillel.

These values are just as needed off campus, in the larger Jewish world. If we want the Jewish diversity of our time not to lead to our Jewish community's ruin, we must each actively cast off our hatreds, suspicions and stereotypes of each other and replace them with civility, trust and respect. As we commemorate the past destructions of our history, let us effect a tikkun – a cosmic reparation – of their causes by committing ourselves to love the totality of the Jewish people, in all our diversity.

Rabbi Aaron Levy is the campus rabbi of University of Toronto Hillel at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

Things start with Him

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

The book of Deuteronomy is unique among the five books of the Torah. The rabbis of the Talmud tell us that this book contains the words of Moses. Unlike the rest of the Torah, which the traditional view maintains reflects God's words as revealed to Moses, the book of Deuteronomy records Moses' words unrevealed. The personal Moses, the man who led Israel as his life's mission, now knowing he will not lead them into the land, reflects upon his life. We have waited all year to hear his words.

The name of the book, Deuteronomy, does not reflect the Hebrew name of the book, Dvarim. Deuteronomy, rooted in ancient Greek, refers to the second rendition of the law that appears within the book. Dvarim literally means "things." These are the "things" that unfold within Moses. These are the things of his mind, the things within all our minds that churn and desperately try to communicate beyond ourselves. This is the book of things.

We anxiously await the first word that Moses will speak on his own behalf. Within a few verses, the text tells us that Moses' first word to Israel is the word "God." Moses pronounces the personal four letter name of God – the Ineffable Name. But would we have expected any less?

If we return to the book of Genesis and search for the first word the text tells us Abraham spoke, we find it early on when Abraham builds an altar and calls in the name of God – the Ineffable Name. It seems that both Abraham and Moses share a first true utterance of vision. Abraham, the visionary who initiates the covenant, and Moses, the visionary who fulfils the journey, both share a starting point of recognizing and connecting with the personal name of God.

Yet we, as a Jewish nation, also have a starting point. In the book of Exodus, we are redeemed from Egypt and leave as individual slaves. Once we have safely crossed the Red Sea and the Egyptian army is no longer a threat, we stand together for the first time as a nation. We are born as a people once we pass through the sea, and with our first breath as the nation Israel, we speak our first word: "Ashira," "I will sing."

It is a beautiful first word, followed by the phrase "to God." As one, we use our first breaths to proclaim "I will sing to God." And yet, as beautiful as it is, it is not the proclamation of a visionary. It is the beginning of a journey. It is the statement "I."

With the first words of Abraham and Moses, who utter the Ineffable Name, we are shown two truly pious and righteous people who understand that all things begin with God, and it is that relationship that informs everything else. The rest of us begin with our ego, with the statement "I" and view the world through its relationship to us.

When we ask our parents, as we all do, what was our first word, we are asking them to reveal to us our starting point in communicating. What was our outlook, what was the thing in our mind that first found its way outward? We all start with a sense of self, the "I," and the examples of Torah show us that we must journey from there to a point where the first words we begin to utter bring us closer to the personal name of God.

Yet there is a phenomenon that can occur on this journey that is neither modern nor ancient, but timeless. There are those who speak of the relationship with God and strive harder and harder to expand that relationship, and, indeed, they become stricter and stricter in their observances.

Yet, they have not changed their first word. To them the Talmud says we attribute the destruction of the world. The rabbis describe "the foolish pious man who sees a woman drowning and reasons, 'I must not jump in to save her for I may see her nakedness.'"

This person foolishly believes he is singing to God when in fact he is still only saying "I."

The ongoing saga of the Dead Sea Scrolls

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The Dead Sea Scrolls continue to fascinate the public some 60 years after their initial discovery. For many people, they represent the ultimate archeological discovery.

No one ever expected literary documents to turn up in Israel. All of the glamorous manuscripts and texts were turning up in Syria, Egypt or Iraq. Yet there had been accounts of a number of discoveries in the area of the Dead Sea in the third and ninth centuries CE. Some scholars believe that those documents influenced the Karaites, a fascinating Jewish sect of the ninth century.

But the ongoing saga of the Dead Sea Scrolls is full of amazing stories. First, there is the story of how Prof. Eliezer Sukenik of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, the father of the legendary Yigael Yadin, obtained the first batch of Scrolls. Yadin recounted these fascinating stories to me when I interviewed him for a series I was doing for the CBC.

He told me that it was on Nov. 29, 1947, the day on which the United Nations in New York first voted to create a Jewish state in Palestine that his father first saw what would come to be known as the Dead Sea Scrolls. This was either a miracle or an amazing coincidence, considering that the last time the Scrolls had seen the light of day was in 70 CE when the previous Jewish state, as well as the Second Temple, were destroyed by the Romans, an event vividly portrayed on the Arch of Titus, which is still standing in the Roman forum.

After Sukenik's death, his son, Yigael Yadin, upon finishing his stint as commander of the Haganah in the War of Independence and acquiring his PhD, continued with his father's quest. Shortly after his father had acquired the first batch of Scrolls for Israel, the others were smuggled out of Palestine to the United States by Mar Athanasius Samuel, the patriarch of the Syriac Church in Jerusalem.

Yadin told me that it was while he was in New York in 1954 that he noticed an advertisement in, of all places, the Wall Street Journal, offering some of the Scrolls for sale. When Yadin attempted to answer the ad, his queries were not answered. Finally, he arranged for an intermediary to get involved.

Initially the asking price was $1 million, but the Scrolls were finally sold for $250,000, thanks to Sam Gottesman, an American-Jewish philanthropist who paid for the acquisition. Then they had to be smuggled back to Israel, with Yadin using a secret code to ascertain their safe arrival back in Jerusalem.

Almost a decade later, while excavating Masada in the early 1960s, Yadin continued to fill his important role in the Scrolls saga. He recounted to me that it was around this time that he paid $10,000 for a small piece of a scroll torn from a much larger document, with a promise that the entire manuscript would be delivered to him for an agreed price.

Nothing more was heard of this find until the Six Day War of 1967 when Yadin was the military advisor to the then-chief of staff, Yitzhak Rabin. Rabin allowed Yadin to send a patrol to east Jerusalem, to the house of Kando, the man who had sold the first batch of Scrolls to Yadin's father. The scroll was found hidden under Kando's home, where the top third had disintegrated. This amazing document came to be known as the Temple Scroll, and Yadin published it in the 1970s as a pleasant distraction from his involvement in Israeli politics.

Part II of the story of the Dead Sea Scrolls will be continued in the next column.

Acts of kindness – random and planned

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish
Highway

It can be hard to relate to disasters that happened 2,000 years ago. We are now in the period called "The Three Weeks," beginning this year on the evening of July 23 – the traditional time of mourning when we remember the destruction of the Temples and other Jewish catastrophes that have occurred on Tisha b'Av.

But the Talmud makes those events feel very relevant when it explains that the Second Temple was destroyed because of "sinat chinam," baseless hatred between Jews. The story is told of a man named Bar-Kamtza who was mistakenly invited to a feast. When the error was discovered, Bar-Kamtza was humiliated and told to leave. In return, Bar-Kamtza became an informant to the Roman Empire. [tinyurl.com/2asuco]

But baseless hatred still rears its head today. How many people who feel wronged in an inheritance choose to drag the case through the courts just to make sure the other side gets nothing? The Ohr Somayach site illustrates this hatred with the following parable: A king told someone, "Ask for anything you desire and I'll give it to you; and to your enemy I'll give double." After thinking awhile, he said, "O, King, poke out one of my eyes." [tinyurl.com/34tabh]

Of course, there is much good out there, too. And many wonderful sites focus on "gemilut chasadim," acts of kindness, for example, Mazornet's Chessed World [tinyurl.com/2zemxz], the World-Wide Chessed Project [tinyurl.com/2lhr43] and the exceptional Ziv Tzedakah Fund. [ziv.org]

The Adat Shalom Reconstructionist Congregation in Bethesda, Md., provides guidelines for three of the central acts of gemilut chesed: visiting the sick (bikur cholim), hospitality (hachnasat orchim) and comforting the mourner (nichum avelim). "In performing acts of gemilut chesed, we seek to unify our historic communal and individual experiences by enhancing our individual personal development as Jews, as members of the present generation of the Jewish people, and as members of the human family." [tinyurl.com/2hz4s5]

Rabbi Rami Shapiro explains that gemilut chasadim means putting other people first. But he emphasizes that this "does not mean denigrating yourself or denying yourself happiness. It means taking the other person into account and seeing how what you say and do impacts on those around you." He says putting the other person first will become natural, but here are some suggestions to get into the swing of things:

- Praise helpful employees to their managers.
- Reply courteously to unsolicited sales calls over the phone.
- Take care of the things that take care of you. Kindness is not simply toward people. The things in your life serve you tirelessly. Maintain your car. Polish your shoes. [tinyurl.com/2ajnf5]

There are many websites that speak about "random acts of kindness," doing the unexpected to bring joy into the lives of others. [actsofkindness.org] Miriam Scheibein questions this approach. "As Jews, we are commanded to visit the sick, clothe the naked, honour the elderly, give tzedakah, and to perform gemilut chasadim, acts of loving kindness. Thus, these acts are not random; they are obligations…" [tinyurl.com/23s7gz]

Emuna Braverman agrees. "We wouldn't advocate random acts of spending. So why treat kindness any less seriously?" She continues, "Sometimes people need empathy; sometimes they need a kick in the pants. A practitioner of well thought out acts of kindness makes this determination. If your kindness is random you may wind up doing more harm than good." [tinyurl.com/2a6kv5]

And here's Rabbi Shaya Karlinsky's take. "We shouldn't shy away from true confrontation and disagreements in pursuit of truth and growth… different people have different perspectives that need to be presented to the world, and without them, the world will be a less perfect place." [tinyurl.com/yp8bo5]

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi in British Mandate Palestine said, "There is no such thing as ahavat chinam – groundless love. Why groundless? He is a Jew, and I am obligated to respect him. There is only "sinat chinam" – hate without reason. But 'ahavat chinam'? Never!" [tinyurl.com/575dn]

Papal mass decree may affect dialogue: rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A July 7 decree from Pope Benedict XVI allowing wider use of the old Latin mass in Catholic churches has sparked concerns among Jews over a conversion prayer that's part of the old Good Friday mass.

"Obviously our concern is not whether they go Latin or English," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas and co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "The prayer [for the conversion of Jews], even as obscure as it is, is entrenching a doctrine we had hoped was a thing of the past."

He added: "There is a major concern about how this is going to affect dialogue. You can't talk with people who have as an agenda to change you to their way and who don't accept your legitimacy."

The prayer sends that message by virtue of being "on [the] books," even if it's only optional and not used, said Rabbi Bulka, who has been involved in Christian-Jewish dialogue for many years. "You can't dialogue as equal partners. It creates problems."

However, he noted, it's too early to comment on the change. "I think people have to see it in order to know how to respond."

Archbishop Thomas Collins

Thomas Collins, the archbishop of Toronto, told The CJN last week that "a lot of people haven't read the document, or read it carefully. A lot of people are commenting on what they think it says."

Nevertheless, the archbishop, who has also been involved with interfaith dialogue, said he doesn't think anyone in the Church considered "any interest the Jewish people might have in this document… It was one side effect that I don't think was intended or maybe even thought of."

Rather, the decree is part of an effort to "bring reconciliation" to those who left the Catholic church when the current service, which replaced the conversion prayer with one for the welfare of Jews, became the main form of worship in 1970.

The decree also aims "to help people within the Catholic Church who treasure the ancient prayers," Archbishop Collins said. Six hundred thousand people now make up the Society of Pius X, which derives from those who left, he added.

"The Catholic church is committed to good relationships with the Jewish people," the archbishop said, citing the 1965 Nostra Aetate declaration that paved the way for better interfaith relations. "This [new decree] is intended as an internal Catholic thing."

The archbishop – who believes the decree is "a good document and much needed for some time" – said it would be difficult to even find a priest today who could celebrate the Latin mass.

"Latin hasn't been taught for 40 years," he said.

Also, he added that according to the decree, the Latin mass would only be celebrated on Good Friday in very rare circumstances. That's because the three days before Easter, which include Good Friday and are known collectively as the Sacred Triduum, are "so central that people should be with the community" and use the standard liturgy, he said.

It is "conceivable but rare" that a small parish that prefers the Latin rites could be considered a "community" and thus be permitted to use the Latin mass, the archbishop said.

The 1970 Missal, as it is known, replaced the Latin version as the standard liturgy. The more recent one is also referred to as the "ordinary" liturgy.

"I think a simple solution would be to take the 1970 prayer [for the Jews] and put it in the 1962 book. The newer prayer, instead of referring to conversion, is a prayer for 'the Jewish people who first received the word of God,'" Archbishop Collins said.

The 1962 Latin prayerbook is "a beautiful prayerbook and has a lot of good in it," said the archbishop. Its prayers are "rich and beautiful and profound, but there were problems."

Father John Walsh, of Montreal's St. John Brébeuf parish, said he would not conduct a Latin service now, although he did so shortly after he was ordained in 1966.

"There's a nostalgia, but not a sense of worship that's going to be enhanced" regarding the Latin service, said Father Walsh, a former co-president of Christian Jewish Dialogue in Montreal who, like Archbishop Collins, studied at Hebrew University.

He agreed with Rabbi Bulka that "honest dialogue would be very difficult" if there were a feeling that Jews should convert.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, who has been involved in Jewish-Catholic dialogue for 37 years, said he thinks the decree represents "a return to traditional philosophy, [but] without anti-Semitic overtones. However, I think there is a danger that the metaphors that may be used will still carry old connotations."

Because of the competing claims to Jerusalem by Israelis and Palestinians, Canadian passport applicants born in Jerusalem are allowed to indicate either that city or the country – Israel in Veffer's case – but not both, as their birthplace.

According to federal policy, Israel is the exception to a rule that allows other Canadian passport holders to list their country of choice as their birthplace, even when a territory is under international dispute.

Veffer argued that this is also discriminatory.

Passport Canada's policy on Jerusalem reads: "Due to the present political situation, Jerusalem must stand alone" when indicated on a passport. The policy came into effect in 1976.

Canadian policy does allow "Palestine" to appear on passports if the applicant was born in Jerusalem prior to May 14, 1948, while the country was still known by that name under British mandate.

In an April 11, 2006, CBC News report, Foreign Affairs Minister, Peter MacKay, spoke about Canada's stance on the issue.

"We do not identify Jerusalem as being in Israel or in Palestine," he said. "That's something that has to be resolved in the context of the larger issues outstanding in the Middle East."

The CJN's calls to the Foreign Affairs Department were not returned.

Federal lawyers argued that according to international law, granting Veffer's request could be seen by some Arab countries as "taking sides" in Middle East affairs, a perception Canada wants to avoid.

In an interview with The CJN, David Matas, Veffer's Winnipeg-based lawyer, called the court's ruling "facetious and nonsensical."

"Canada won the peace prize in the old days when you could put Jerusalem, Israel, on your passport," he added.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), told The CJN he is dismayed by the ruling and indicated that his organization must work harder in the political sector "in order to secure a meaningful recognition of the inherent and unique connection between Jerusalem and the Jewish people – including the status of Jerusalem, Israel's capital."

Veffer, now studying at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, was given 90 days to file an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Gordon Wiseman, another lawyer for Veffer, has said his client intends to continue the fight.

Harper mulling reinstatement of funding to Palestinian Authority

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper said last week he was still considering whether to resume funding to the Palestinian Authority on the West Bank, the territory controlled by PA President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party after it was violently expelled from Gaza by Hamas last month.

During a two-day visit to Ottawa by King Abdullah II of Jordan last week, some newspaper reports said Harper was set to pledge $8 million in immediate aid to the PA and bump up the total to $30 million shortly thereafter.

Stephen Harper

The reports said the Harper government had decided to lift its funding freeze-out of the PA, in place since Hamas won legislative elections last year.

Canada, which considers Hamas a terrorist group and was one of the first countries to suspend aid to the Palestinian Authority after it gained control of the Palestinian parliament, would also urge Abbas to end the corruption that is perceived to be rampant in his government, the reports said.

Repeated attempts by The CJN to confirm the reports with the Prime Minister's Office were unsuccessful as of press time last week.

But Harper and King Abdullah held a press conference on Friday, July 13, after a private morning meeting on Parliament Hill, and Harper reaffirmed his support for Abbas and the Mideast peace process.

King Abdullah II

"It's important that moderate Middle East leaders have support," Harper said. "We must use negotiations instead of force. Now that Hamas is not the government… we support Abbas."

For his part, the Jordanian king thanked Canada for its role in helping to foster peace and said he hoped Canada would do more over the coming weeks and "be part of a larger team to renew peace in the region."

In recent weeks, King Abdullah has publicly urged Canada to use its leverage as a "friend of Israel" to pressure Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to accept a peace initiative proposed by the Arab League, of which Jordan is a member.

The League's plan, first outlined in 2002 and recently reaffirmed, calls for all Arab countries to formally recognize and normalize relations with Israel. In return, Israel would relinquish all lands captured in the 1967 Six-Day War, partake in the creation of a Palestinian state and acknowledge the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees.

While Israel has welcomed the chance to renew peace negotiations, it has remained cool to some of the details of the plan, particularly regarding the call for a Palestinian right of return.

Harper told reporters he regretted that Olmert was unable to visit Canada earlier this year, but said he remained confident a meeting would take place between them shortly.

The prime minister also called on Israelis and Palestinians to accept that a two-state solution is the "only possible outcome" for peace.

Arab League representatives from Egypt and Jordan are scheduled to arrive in Israel this month for the start of bilateral talks.

Blog TV provides users with their 15 minutes of fame

By DEBORAH STRESCU
Special to The CJN

Israel and Canada are two countries with obvious differences in climate, geographic location and size.

After speaking with Claude Galipeau, executive vice-president of Alliance Atlantis, however, it seems that Canada and Israel have much more in common than you might think.

Blog TV, Canada's only live video blogging service, through which users become their own broadcasters, was brought from Israel about two years ago.

Tapuz, a web portal and the largest social media website in Israel, launched the service after it began to work with Israeli reality TV.

The site allows people to broadcast from their own home and see themselves on TV. The service was an immediate success, which prompted Tapuz to expand Blog TV to mobile.

Shemi Levi, the CEO of GS (Gravity Sabio) New Media, a distribution company based in Toronto, with offices in London and Tel Aviv, decided to bring Blog TV to Canada. He partnered with Alliance Atlantis, the broadcasting, entertainment and motion picture distributor, to make it happen.

In March 2007, Blog TV celebrated its launch in Canada. Almost immediately, more than 400,000 bloggers visited the site, and within a month this number grew to over 1.1 million. Twelve hundred live shows are created every day.

What is the appeal, you ask? Well, according to Galipeau and Levi, Blog TV is a "novel and unique application in the Canadian face of technology." Blog TV, above anything else, is a platform to express yourself more directly with your "fan base" and "a chance to be famous."

You must be Canadian-based to register as a user of Blogtv.ca.The Canadian aspect of the website is extremely attractive, say Galipeau and Levi, as "it's a Canada club... They're not lost in a sea of foreign users."

Israeli Blog TV works on the same principle, as Israelis are just as patriotic as Canadians. The idea behind the website is to be proud of who you are and to express yourself in an open environment.

"Anyone can become famous on Blog TV," says Levi. "Even those who have serious psychological problems... They share their difficulties, and one can see that they are extremely bright people."

On Blog TV, those with real problems are "big celebs" because people can relate. There is a variety of content on the website, ranging from sports and politics to the meaning of the Qur'an.

On the Canadian website, hundreds of programs are broadcast across the country. Programs includes DVD and music reviews, prankster programs (à la Leno and Stern) and live Q&A sessions with TV hosts of food and gardening shows. There is even after-hours content provided for all different moods.

Claude Galipeau

Shemi Levi

Whether it's because of its innovative technology, creative service or variety of programs, Blog TV is taking off. What will this mean for the way we communicate with each other in the future? Increasingly, we are seeing audiences taking charge of content, as "media companies are embracing their audiences as creators," says Galipeau.

Broadcasters are no longer in charge; we are witnessing the democratization of distributing content. Blog TV is simply another example of this, and it is proof of the success and popularity of user-generated content. Thoughts are original not edited or scripted.

Alliance Atlantis recognized the potential of this idea. Tapuz's success with its Blog TV website was phenomenal, a testament to the technology visionaries of Israel.

Galipeau thought to customize their vision for Canada and with Alliance Atlantis, a company that speaks clearly to a defined community of interests with 13 specialty channels. Galipeau believed he could relate those interests in the online forum, an alternative to watching television.

There are even plans to expand to mobile, which is working well in Israel.

The marketing campaign for Blog TV includes a crew of 24/7 bloggers who run around Toronto interviewing people in clubs and various hot-dog stands throughout the city.

YouTube has carried display ads online for Canadian Blog TV. Google Israel helped launch Blog TV in Israel.

So far, Canadian Blog TV has managed to create a buzz. Galipeau believes that the "fact that it's live gives Blog TV a high degree of authenticity and unexpectedness."

Any broadcaster can interact with their fans in a live network. This aspect is "addictive," says Levi, as users want to be interactive.

"It is an amazing experience for anyone that wants to be someone."

Three additional universities come out against British boycott

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Three more Canadian universities have come out against a proposed boycott of Israeli academic institutions by Britain's largest post-secondary teachers union.

B.C.'s Simon Fraser University, Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., and Toronto's Ryerson University have all added their names to the growing list of Canadian academic institutions that have denounced the proposal, passed May 30, which urges members of the University and College Union (UCU) to consider a boycott of Israeli universities.

'Conflicts with the free exchange of ideas'

In a statement last week, Michael Stevenson, president of Simon Fraser University said, "I wish to state my clear disapproval of such a move. An academic boycott conflicts with the free exchange of ideas and research that is central to the mission of universities."

Stevenson continued, "Israeli universities share our commitment to the fundamental value of academic freedom. I call for all who subscribe to this value to oppose the proposed boycott of Israeli universities."

On July 9, Sheldon Levy, president of Ryerson, stated, "I must add my voice to those who have urged [UCU members] to reject any call for a boycott of Israeli universities. We will not stand by as the very nature of university education is being undermined."

In a July 6 statement on her university's website, Queen's principal Karen Hitchcock declared, "The academic boycott of Israeli universities being considered by [UCU] is antithetical to the core value of academic freedom."

Hitchcock called the proposal "ill-advised," adding, "We are proud to align ourselves with those who deplore the UCU's unacceptable attack on the values and principles that define us."

The addition of Simon Fraser, Queen's and Ryerson brings the number of Canadian universities voicing support for Israeli academia to 17.

Others that have denounced the boycott proposal are the University of Toronto, McGill University, Concordia University, the University of British Columbia, the Université de Montréal, York University, the University of Western Ontario, Dalhousie University, the University of Ottawa, the Université de Québec à Montréal, and the universities of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Calgary and Alberta.

Ottawa lawyer gets public service's highest honour

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Henry Molot, a lawyer in the federal Justice Department, recently received the Public Service Award for Excellence.

The award was presented June 14 by Kevin Lynch, clerk of the Privy Council.

In his message congratulating this year's recipients, Lynch said, "Your efforts have made a positive difference in the lives of Canadians, while exemplifying the values, ethics and priorities of the public service. In being selected for this award, you are being recognized both for your dedication and achievement as public servants."

Henry Molot

Molot, 68, joined the department in 1966 after his graduation from Yale Law School. After his first year, he took a four-year "break" to teach at the University of Ottawa and the University of Alberta in Edmonton, but he returned in 1971 and remained there until his retirement this past spring.

For a man so deeply involved in Jewish life, it's fitting that Molot received the award in his "double chai" year of service.

Known as the Justice Department's leading authority on administrative law as well as aspects of constitutional law, parliamentary law, statutory interpretation and Crown liability, Molot is widely respected both professionally and personally.

A modest, thoughtful and easygoing colleague, Molot has for many years been a mentor to junior members of the department. More than 20 years ago, he created the popular department-wide Constitutional Law Seminar and thanks each speaker with a gift of bagels.

Molot was born and grew up in Ottawa and is a fixture in its Jewish institutional life. He and his wife, Maureen, are members, or associate members, of four synagogues. He is also a longstanding member of the Ottawa Chevra Kadisha; of the Jewish National Fund (Ottawa); the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society; the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation; and is on the Tikvah Committee of Jewish Family Services.

"It is great that Henry has received such recognition," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress and spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas. "But knowing Henry, that is still not as important to him as bringing laughter and cheer to all those in his ambience."

Molot received official notification of being chosen for the award while vacationing in Israel.

"There we were in the Tel Aviv Art Museum in the middle of an exhibition… when our cellphone suddenly begins to ring. In my usual fashion, I grope for the phone in my shirt pocket… and who was on the other end of the line but my deputy minister! I have to apologize to him for not being able to speak loudly enough while in the museum, and in the meantime, scurry out of the exhibition hall into the lobby area," he said.

Waterloo teen's sudden death stuns community

Case remains under investigation

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Leejay Levene will be remembered by his friends and family for his kindness, depth, sense of humour and artistic talent.

The 18-year-old Waterloo, Ont., youth went to the dentist to have his wisdom teeth pulled on Wednesday, July 5. He was put under a general anesthetic, with intubation to help him breathe, but almost immediately had trouble breathing. Paramedics were called, but Levene's heart was not beating when they arrived five minutes later.

He was rushed to Grand River Hospital. His heart started beating again, but his internal organs had failed and he was put on life support. His parents decided to disconnect the machine Thursday evening.

"It's tragic. We're all shocked here, because this is an anomaly," said Irwin Fefergrad, the registrar for the Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario. "Intubation sedation is very, very safe."

Dr. Timothy Wallace who performed the surgery was not available for comment. He has practised dentistry for more than 30 years and treated thousands of patients for wisdom tooth extractions under general anesthetic, Fefergrad said.

Wallace used an outside anesthesiologist to administer the medication, which Fefergrad said is common practice so that the oral surgeon can focus on the surgery.

"At the moment, the case is continuing in investigation," said acting regional coroner Dr. David Evans. At the end of the investigation, he said, he can submit the case to an inquest committee.

The body was not released until after Leejay's parents, Ron and Shifra, won their fight against having a full autopsy, with the help of local Rabbi Yosil Rosenzweig.

Funeral services were held at Temple Shalom, a Reform congregation, on Friday, July 7, with Rabbi Rosenzweig officiating. Six hundred people packed the synagogue. Some of them had flown in from across the continent, including a group of camp friends from Halifax.

"I've never seen anything like that," said Ron, who noted that because everything happened so quickly, the family was not able to alert the press or many other people about the funeral. "It's just kind of a testament to how he touched the lives of so many people."

"He was nice to everybody, he respected everybody," said Leejay's brother Elli, 16. "He was one of those people who you can get close to. He was a really good student and he put deep thought into his work. If I needed a good idea, I would go to him."

Leejay graduated from Sir John A. Macdonald Secondary School and was headed to the University of Toronto in the fall. The artistic teen planned to study architecture.

He is described by his family as a deep thinker with a rich sense of humour. A clarinet and bass guitar player, he enjoyed indie punk and rock bands like Alesana and Silverstein.

Leejay's high school held a memorial for him. Camp Arowhon will plant a tamarack tree with a plaque in his name, and the humane society where he volunteered also plans to do something in his honour. His friends have created a website, www.leejaylevine.com.

"There will be sort of an emptiness where Leejay used to be. It will never be the same," said Martin Levene, Leejay's grandfather.

Martin has fond memories of his grandson at the family's chalets near Collingwood, Ont., with his grandmother, Charlotte, aunts, uncles and eight cousins. Leejay loved snowboarding.

The tragic story ends on a bittersweet note. Seven hours after his death, the Levene family welcomed their first great-grandchild.

The baby was originally meant to be named Jordana Rose Singer. Her middle name was changed to Lee.

Jerusalem mayor asks Turkey to return ancient tablet

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem's mayor has asked the Turkish government to return a famous 2,700-year-old tablet uncovered in an ancient subterranean passage in the city, Jerusalem officials said Friday.

Known as the Siloam inscription, the tablet was found in a tunnel hewed to channel water from a spring outside Jerusalem's walls into the city around 700 B.C.E. — a project mentioned in the Old Testament's Book of Chronicles. It was discovered in 1880 and taken by the Holy Land's Ottoman rulers to Istanbul, where it is now in the collection of the Istanbul Archeology Museum.

Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski made the request in a July 12 meeting with Turkey's ambassador to Israel, Namik Tan, Lupolianski's spokesperson, Gidi Schmerling, said July 13.

Lupolianski suggested the tablet's return could be a gesture of goodwill from Turkey, Schmerling said.

An official in Turkey's embassy in Israel, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the request would be passed on to the Turkish government. A transfer of ownership is unlikely, the official said, but Turkey will look into lending the tablet to Israel or creating a replica.

In the Bible's account, the Siloam water tunnel was constructed by King Hezekiah to solve one of ancient Jerusalem's most pressing problems – its most important water source, the Siloam spring, was outside the city walls and vulnerable to the kingdom's Assyrian enemies.

The tunnel, around 500 metres long, was hollowed out of the bedrock by two teams of diggers starting from each end, according to the tablet, which was installed to celebrate the moment the two teams met underground, pickax to pickax.

When there were only three cubits more to cut through, the men were heard calling from one side to the other, the Hebrew inscription recounts.

The tunnel and spring are located in what is today the east Jerusalem Arab neighbourhood of Silwan, which has been controlled by Israel since 1967.

Soldier killed in Gaza

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli special forces backed by tanks entered Bureij, a village in the central Gaza Strip, last Thursday in search of Palestinian gunmen and weapons caches.

Staff Sgt. Arbel Reich, 21, from Yuvalim in the Galilee, was killed when his unit came under fire from Islamic Jihad militants.

Reich was shot as a reconnaissance unit of the brigade carried out an operation two kilometres into the Gaza Strip. Two other soldiers were injured in the incident.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the killing. There are least four Palestinian casualties in the clash.

Israel has mounted regular cross-border incursions since Hamas seized control of Gaza last month. The operations appear aimed at pre-empting Palestinian terrorist infiltrations.

Israel alone on Iran?

NATO leaders reportedly told Israel that it would have to stop Iran's nuclear program alone. Israeli Strategic Affairs Minister Avigdor Lieberman, who visited NATO headquarters in Brussels two weeks ago, said he came away with the impression that western powers are unwilling to use pre-emptive military strikes to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, Yediot Achronot reported.

Israel warns Morocco

Israel reportedly warned Morocco about impending Al Qaeda attacks. Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, meeting her Moroccan counterpart in Paris last week, passed on intelligence information on the recent infiltration of Islamist terrorists in Maghreb, Morocco's Al Ahdath al Maghribia reported last week. The newspaper said Livni's tip seems to have been corroborated by a European Union alert about possible terror attacks in Morocco and Algeria. Livni's aides denied knowledge of any intelligence sharing. Morocco is home to 3,000 Jews and has low-level ties with Israel.

Life after Gush Katif

By EDGAR ASHER

MAVKI'IM, Israel — A gift of $700,000 (Cdn) from the Jewish community of British Columbia has changed the lives of 11 families who lived in the Gush Katif settlement of the Gaza Strip before the August 2005 withdrawal from the area.

The money was raised by the Canadian Keren Kayemet LeIsrael – Jewish National Fund (JNF) in Vancouver, in honour of the 100th birthday last month of B.C. philanthropist Ben Dayson, who contributed most of the funds.

"With this donation, JNF was able to prepare the entire infrastructure for greenhouses [in Mavki'im], just south of the Mediterranean city of Ashkelon. This means that 11 families who were evacuated from Gush Kativ can restart their businesses," said Aaron (Araleh) Lapidot, the JNF shaliach in Vancouver, who returned to Israel to participate in a ceremony to dedicate the new project.

One of the former residents of the settlement of Ganei Tal in Gush Katif is Ronit Balaban. Balaban made aliyah from Sweden in 1971 when she was 16. In 1985, Balaban, now married with three small children, went to live with her husband, Ya'acov, in Ganei Tal and set up a successful business of flowering potted plants for export to Europe in the winter season.

In 2002, Ya'acov was gravely injured by a terrorist bomb near Tel Aviv and Ronit decided to continue to run the business herself with the help of her oldest child, Ayelet, then 22.

Balaban's hard work paid off, and soon 750,000 plants were growing on her nine-acre farm. In 2004, the government announced its plan to evacuate all Jewish settlements from Gaza. Balaban decided to co-operate, hoping her business could be transferred into Israel with minimal loss. Six months before the actual disengagement, she started looking for a suitable location. She chose an area south of Ashdod that had a climate somewhat similar to that of Ganei Tal.

"I was not happy with the disengagement to say the least, but I decided to co-operate with the disengagement authority," Balaban said. "When we left Gush Katif, the government said, 'We have a solution for every settler.' They didn't have and haven't such a solution, and all the settlers felt very let down."

About two months before the disengagement, Balaban went to visit a possible site for her business in Mavki'im, suggested to her by JNF.

Balaban agreed to move to the new location, and JNF sent in bulldozers to remove the acacia bushes and flatten the land. With the help of volunteers, she brought about half her plants to Mavki'im.

The Canadian gift has enabled JNF to complete the essential infrastructure, and the 11 families are grateful to JNF for enabling them to start over. Today only about a quarter of the farmers from Gush Katif have been able to transfer their businesses to Israel. Like Balaban, most of them will be in debt for years.

Growing trend to delegitimize Israel

By AMIRAM BARKAT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The trend toward delegitimizing Israel's existence as a Jewish state is growing not only in Europe, but also in the United States, according to Jewish-American academics and community leaders.

Anti-Israel attacks are even beginning to affect Jewish supporters of Israel, who have been accused of trying to silence public debate, they said.

This trend toward delegitimization was one of the topics discussed at a conference on the future of the Jewish people in Jerusalem last week. The conference, which was attended by researchers, heads of Jewish organizations and senior Israeli politicians, was organized by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.

Avinoam Bar-Yosef, JPPPI's director general, said that anti-Israel attacks in the U.S. constitute a "long-term threat" to Israel's standing, American Jewish organizations and the pro-Israel lobby.

"Public attention is currently focused on Europe, due to initiatives like the [proposed] British academic boycott," he said. "In the U.S., the problem is still under the radar. But as a planning institute, we believe that it is necessary to formulate policy on this issue now."

Brandeis University President Jehuda Reinharz told Ha'aretz that American academics are at the forefront of those denying Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. Veteran advocates of this position, such as Tony Judt and Noam Chomsky, were joined last year by Stephen Walt and John Mearsheimer, both from reputable academic institutions, who charged that the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) dictates American foreign policy.

"My feeling, and that of many people, following Walt and Mearsheimer and other publications is that we are at the start of a new era with regard to attitudes toward Israel in the U.S.," he added.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, believes that Jimmy Carter's book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, which was published last November, had a much greater impact than did other publications.

"In the past, people who said that Jewish supporters of Israel control the media and politics belonged to the margins," he said. "But after former president Carter said it, it gained legitimacy in the mainstream. Today, the debate is already on questions such as to what extent the Jews dominate."

Foxman said that Jews who challenge anti-Israel attacks find themselves accused of undermining freedom of expression.

Reinharz said that he is worried by the lack of effective response to anti-Israel publications.

"I see no combined effort to fight this by the Jewish organizations, and in truth, I myself don't know how this could be done," he said.

Pro-Israel Muslim journalist due to stand trial

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The Bangladeshi Muslim journalist who could be facing execution or three decades in prison for daring to advocate that his country recognize Israel was due to have his trial begin on July 18.

Canadian Journalists for Free Expression, as well as former justice minister Irwin Cotler, are among those who have been making representations on behalf of Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury.

Choudhury, the editor of the provocative Bangladeshi newspaper, The Weekly Blitz, is charged with sedition, treason and blasphemy.

Cotler is serving as his international counsel and has submitted what he described as an exhaustive brief to the Bangladesh court delineating the "violations of its own laws of such magnitude" that the case should be dismissed outright, he said in an interview with The CJN.

Cotler said his brief outlines the complete lack of due process in Choudhury's case, which violated virtually every principal of justice, including his right of being presumed innocent, to have legal counsel, to be protected against coercive interrogation and many more.

"These are false charges with fabricated evidence. What you have here is a systematic violation of his rights," he said.

The charges – which Choudhury and his defenders avow are trumped up and the result of Choudhury's persistent efforts to promote human rights and positive relations between Muslims and Jews, as well as to speak out against Islamic extremism and have his country accept Israel – go back to November 2003.

At that time, he was charged with the minor offence of violating Bangladesh's Passport Act for trying to travel via Bangkok to Israel to attend a writers' peace conference in Tel Aviv.

Bangladeshis are forbidden from traveling to Israel because Bangladesh doesn't have diplomatic relations with Israel.

Choudhury subsequently disclosed that following his initial detention, he was blindfolded and beaten for 10 days, and accused of spying for Israel. But he refused to confess.

Two months later, he was charged with sedition and spent 17 months in solitary confinement. Cotler has written that all this took place "without access to counsel or even medical treatment for debilitating glaucoma."

In April of 2005, Choudhury was finally released on bail, largely due, he related on a July 11 Weekly Blitz website posting, to the efforts of U.S. Congressman Mark Steven Kirk and "my Jewish brother," Dr. Richard Benkin, who elicited the support of groups and politicians all over the world.

Cotler noted that the trial has already been postponed four times and that he hoped Bangladesh's Supreme Court would be able to rule on a motion to quash the charges before the trial began.

He noted that a considerable number of representations have been made on Chouhury's behalf, including – from the Canadian perspective – by Cotler to Bangladesh's High Commissioner, who gave Cotler reason to believe that the charges might be dropped.

He hopes the pressure on Bangladesh would have a salutary effect on the case. "If not, we will have to notch it up," he said. "It could have an adverse effect on Canadian-Bangladeshi relations.

"In my opinion, they should acquit, not only because it is the right thing to do, but because it is their self-interest, politically, diplomatically and economically."

Cotler said it was "patently ridiculous" for Choudhury to be considered an Israeli spy. "Why would a secret agent proclaim his support for Israel?"

Choudhury has said that about a year ago, he became "the target of continuous threats, intimidation and violence," including the bombing of his newspaper office by Muslim extremists.

Cotler noted that Canada has been an active partner and participant in a Canada-Bangladesh Rule of Law project, including joint initiatives to promote the protection of fundamental rights as well as due-process principles and the rule of law in Bangladesh.

In a Weekly Blitz website posting six days before his trial was to begin, Choudhury blamed a corrupt caretaker government led by the BNP-Jamaat coalition (the most corrupt and most violent government in Bangladesh's history, according to Frontline, an Indian magazine) for his travails.

Choudhury noted in his posting that the U.S. Congress and European Parliament have passed motions on his behalf, as have organizations such as PEN, Reporters without Borders, the Committee to Protect Journalists, Middle East Web and the American Jewish Committee.

However, he wrote that "most of the so-called human rights groups maintained tight lip on my case.

"Imagine, a place in this world where criticizing Islamist militancy is blasphemy. Imagine a country where advocating interfaith understanding is sedition. Imagine a country where talking about establishment of relations with Israel is treason," he continued.

"Could we ever believe that someone would be arrested, tortured and imprisoned just for being in favour of global peace, interfaith dialogue and ending religious hatred?

"Yes, all this happened during the past five years…

Choudhury concluded: "Many times I questioned myself as to how long I shall have to bear the burden of such notorious allegations. But up to now, there is no reply to it.

"Should the present interim… government in Bangladesh continue the false allegations and charges against me, which had been falsely brought up by the former rulers, who are nothing but a bunch of corrupts and culprits?

"Who will reply to my questions?"

Cotler says 2007 is like 1938 for Jews

By YAIR ETTINGER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In some ways, 2007 is 1938 for the Jewish people," former Canadian justice minister Irwin Cotler said July 9 in his keynote speech in Jerusalem at the opening of the Conference on the Future of the Jewish People.

Jews face "a gathering storm without parallel or precedent since the 1930s," Cotler said, referring to the nuclear threat from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran, as well as the threats posed by Hamas, Syria, Hezbollah and global Islamist terror.

But he added that the existence of Israel – as well as the wealth of Jews worldwide and the support for Israel by such states as Canada, Australia and the United States – distinguishes the current age from the pre-World War II era.

The conference, organized by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI), aims to set priorities for the Jewish people and to create strategies to head off the threats facing it.

The 120 participants in the three-day conference include community leaders, academics, Israeli cabinet ministers and Jews from abroad.

In his own keynote address, JPPPI chairman Dennis Ross also referred to the Iranian threat, saying that a nuclear-capable Iran would change the world as we know it. He said that once Iran obtains nuclear weapons, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and other Middle Eastern countries would be interested in following its lead.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert also addressed the conference on its opening day.

Iran stones gays to death

JTA

TEHRAN — Iran is executing citizens for adultery, "rape, insulting religious sanctities and laws, and homosexuality." The Islamic Republic's government confirmed last week that it executed an adulterer earlier this month by stoning, and that 20 more men would be executed in the next few days on morality violations, the New York Times reported.

The stoning was carried out near the city of Takestan, despite an order by the chief of the judiciary, Ayatollah Mahmoud Shahroudi, not to permit such executions. Most executions in Iran are public hangings, often at the scenes of the alleged crimes, according to the report.

Eye on Arts

CHINA COLLECTION SHINES AT THE GARDINER MUSEUM OF CERAMIC ART

The Gardiner Museum houses a world-class collection of ceramics in a beautifully renovated building on University Avenue that was greeted as an architectural triumph when it was unveiled a year ago.

The Toronto Star's architecture critic Christopher Hume called it "easily the most compelling, even exhilarating, example of architectural excellence to have appeared in Toronto in some time." That statement presumably holds true even after the recent opening of the Royal Ontario Museum's much-touted Crystal across the street – of which the Gardiner affords a delightful view.

Displayed in the museum are thousands of works that span many periods, including the Ancient Americas, Italian Renaissance and the heyday of Chinese and Japanese porcelain. Currently on view is the special exhibition "Made in China," consisting of some 150 objects produced from the 1500s to the 1800s, all made in China for export to western markets. After viewing the exhibit, you may wish to relax with a drink on the outdoor patio overlooking the street. www.gardinermuseum.com

Names in the News: Israeli author Amos Oz, who is a professor of Hebrew literature at Ben-Gurion University in Israel, has been awarded a literary prize from the Prince of Asturias Foundation in Spain, alongside former winners such as Mario Vargas Llosa, Gunter Grass, Doris Lessing and Arthur Miller.

Amos Oz

According to the awards committee, Oz has "fashioned the Hebrew language into a brilliant instrument for literary art and for the truthful disclosure of the most dire and universal realities of our time, focusing especially on advocating peace amongst peoples and condemning all forms of fanaticism."

Oz has written 18 books in Hebrew and hundreds of articles and essays. His works have been translated into more than 30 languages. In a statement, he said, "If I have to say in one word what my entire literary work is all about, I would say 'families.' If I had two words, I would say 'unhappy families.' If I had more than two words, you would have to read my works."

Arts in Brief

- The recent fourth annual Israeli Film Festival, during which four films were screened at the National Archives in Ottawa, was "a success both in terms of numbers of attendees – setting records on subsequent nights – and the quality of films screened," said Gali Karmon, cultural officer with the Israeli Embassy. Director Neil Weisbrod was on hand to introduce his documentary film about Ilan Ramon's ill-fated trip into space aboard the space shuttle Atlantis. The other films were Sweet Mud, Three Mothers and Frozen Days.
- The Koffler Centre of the Arts presents its first annual Summer Arts Party for children aged six to 16, daily from Monday, Aug. 27, through Friday, Aug. 31, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Arts "partiers" help the children learn about and explore many art forms – music, dance, painting, drawing, pottery – with the help of professional artists, including drummer Kwasi Dunyo from Ghana and television and film recording artist Alan Hetherington. The cost is $350. For details or to register, please call 416-636-1880, ext. 222.
- Just For Laughs comedy festival comes to Yonge-Dundas Square and vicinity, July 26 and 27, 6 to 11 p.m. Some 60 shows are to be presented on a series of stages. Visit www.hahaha.com for details.

At the Galleries

- Toronto artist Hillel Kagan has contributed a series of paintings to Art Process Trapani 2007, an international exhibition in Trapani, Sicily. The paintings appear to be portraits of rabbis. "For over a thousand years, rabbis, scholars and thinkers from Maimonides and Spinoza to Buber and Kafka and countless others, have benefited European culture even while under duress from their neighbours," Kagan said in an artist's statement. "It's in the spirit of that contribution that I've created this series of paintings." See a portfolio of Kagan's works at www.artprocess.com.
- "The Long and Winding Road," an exhibition by artist Susan Szenes, is at the Engine Gallery Distillery, Distillery District, 55 Mill St., until July 31.
- "Ancient Peru Unearthed: Golden Treasures of a Lost Civilization" is one of two exhibits at the Royal Ontario Museum that have been extended until Sept. 3. It features a collection of elaborately crafted objects reflecting the pre-Incan Sicán culture, some dating back 1,000 years; as an accompanying documentary film explains, they were only excavated in the 1990s. Also at the ROM, the exhibit "Hiroshi Sugimoto: History of History" has been extended to Sept. 3.

Israeli's Cemetery Club is humorous, poignant, saddening

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

For two decades, a group of Israeli seniors have been planting their folding chairs in a circle every Saturday at the Mount Herzl National Cemetery in Jerusalem. There they discuss life, banter, share memories and eat lunch.

These meetings are the subject of Tali Shemesh's documentary, The Cemetery Club. Shemesh has been following the "Academy" for the last five years, focusing on Minya, her grandmother, and Lena, her great-aunt, who are both Polish Holocaust survivors. Dialogue is in Hebrew and Polish with English subtitles.

The group's conversations are intriguing and thought provoking. The seniors, who are mostly Holocaust survivors, have varied and interesting opinions on a myriad of topics, from poetry and politics to philosophy. Some of them listen, while others are eager to share stories or recite poems that bring tears to their eyes.

The Cemetery Club's meetings are humorous at times, with conversations ranging from light to serious. But when the film explores the conflicts between Lena and Minia, it tends to drag.

Lena is a well-educated and well-read bossy bully. Her chatterbox harshness is almost beyond belief. Minya is hardly able to get a word in when they are on camera together, and is constantly criticized by Lena, but it is evident that the two widows are inseparable.

Shemesh is often in the film as an interviewer. She brings out Lena's overly dramatic and curmudgeonly qualities. Lena is, nevertheless, an interesting soul with quite the history, and one-on-one interviews with Shemesh reveal some riveting stories about family and survival.

The film's cinematography is beautiful. It is shot in a variety of locations, including the Dead Sea, Jerusalem streets, various private homes and, of course, Mount Herzl National Cemetery.

Shaky camera work takes away from the cinematography's beauty, sometimes making the film hard to watch.

Most poignant and saddening is the film's look at aging Holocaust survivors. Over the five-year period, several of the Cemetery Club members die, and the club must rethink its Mount Herzl location.

Documentary gives a voice to Israeli Arabs

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When the Israeli government announced its decision to disengage from the Gaza Strip in 2005, a heated emotional and political debate erupted and Israeli news outlets interviewed Jews throughout the country who were either for or against the plan.

Ron Furman, a Haifa-born Canadian filmmaker, was in Israel in the weeks before the disengagement and was struck by the absence of the Israeli-Arab voice in the debate.

He sought to remedy this omission and give Israeli Arabs a voice in his latest documentary, titled Disengaged From Reality.

Last month, 28-year-old director Furman and producer Zohar Romm, 23, screened the film – which has already been picked up by TPI Distribution – for the first time at the Regent Theatre in Toronto.

Furman said he spent a month interviewing Israeli Arabs who live and work in Israel and enjoy the benefits of being Israeli citizens.

Many of his subjects described their satisfaction with the standard of living in Israel and regard their Jewish co-workers and neighbours as friends, as they are treated with respect.

But still, as the interviews progressed, comments were made about Jews keeping Arabs under their thumb.

"If you are a Jew, please don't get mad. But Hitler is better than you," one subject said.

Despite repeated calls for peace, another subject said he'd like nothing more than to rip the beard off a Jewish man's face and cut off his legs.

Others said they loved living in Israel and thought of it as home, and wouldn't consider moving, even if there was a Palestinian state.

Despite that, one refused to condemn Palestinian aggression.

"You are saying they are terrorists. Yet the whole world doesn't agree. I don't find them to be terrorists," he said.

Between the interviews, Furman incorporated images of the Israel-Palestinian conflict, as well as images portraying the hostilities between Israelis who were both for and against the disengagement.

One optimistic interviewee predicted that "if the Israeli government goes out of Gaza, they would have their land. Do you think there will be more trouble once they've got their own land?"

Hindsight shows that the disengagement didn't deliver the scenario that millions hoped for, yet all the Israeli Arabs who were interviewed hoped that the disengagement would bring peace.

One of the Israeli-Arabs interviewed in Disengaged From Reality.

In an interview with The CJN, Furman said that he felt that the disengagement process was a failure.

"The reason we [settled in Gaza] was in order to have a bargaining chip for peace. We got nothing in return, except another war, more operations, terrorist cells, no peace and 8,000 displaced Jewish citizens… It was not a mistake to leave, but a failed attempt for peace," said Furman, who works with Stand With Us, an organization that works to enhance Israel's image internationally.

That aside, Furman said he was happy that the film was able to show that Israeli Arabs do not live as second-class citizens.

"Some of them recognized that Israel was a country for the Jews, but at the same time a democracy that is open to all cultures. When I lived in Israel, I saw that first hand. However, hearing it from the horse's mouth and having it on camera was worth it all," said Furman, who added that the response to his film has been amazing.

On the other side of the coin, Furman said he was affected by one of his interviewees living in Jerusalem who "always had a smile on his face about being completely bigoted and hateful towards anyone who wasn't Muslim."

"I actually had a one-hour interview with him, and he kept contradicting himself over and over again," Furman said, adding that his subject referred to an article in which a Hamas member was quoted as saying Hamas will kill every man, woman and child who looks like a Zionist, but later said that Israel needs to have mercy on innocent Palestinians.

Following the screening, a panel that included Tarek Fatah, the founder of the Muslim Congress of Canada; Peter Kent, candidate for MP of Thornhill; and Raheel Raza, an author, speaker and interfaith advocate discussed the film and took questions from the audience.

Kent said that he was struck by the fact that many of the subjects would choose to stay in Israel regardless of whether a Palestinian state was established.

"They were content and satisfied with their situation. They recognized that they have absolutely no inclination to go to Gaza or the West Bank, where expressing even some of those very gentle thoughts of a peaceful coexistence with the state of Israel would be suicidal. They would not be able to express those thoughts about Israel," Kent said.

Raza said the film is important because "for once we weren't hearing from the so-called experts, but from the people who say that they still want peace despite what is happening. They're not pointing fingers and saying who is right or wrong. They are people who are living there and are passionate about peace, and what comes through also is the realization that there needs to be justice."

Fatah said that for there to be peace in the Middle East, the Arab states would have to come to sincerely believe that Israel has a right to exist within secure and sovereign borders.

"Until and unless that comprehensive peace is achieved, it is foolhardy to believe that war or a conflict that is based on race and religion will not affect the lives of innocent people on each side of the border. Even if the best people have the best intentions, people are going to suffer," Fatah said.

Furman, who is moving to Los Angeles next month in hopes of furthering his film career, is also about to release a film called Welcome Home, about birthright israel trips, and Intensive Care, a documentary about the extraordinary relationship between two doctors – one an Arab and the other a Jew – who worked together at Haifa's Rambam Hospital during the Second Lebanon War.

Musician presents free roots, world-music concert

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Brian Gladstone, along with his five siblings, inherited musical talent from the family patriarch. Growing up, the Gladstone kids all played well together – literally – and music wafted through the air at the Gladstone abode in Toronto.

And they're still playing together, as they did in the 1960s and '70s. "We have the best jam sessions of our lives when we all get together," says Gladstone, a singer-songwriter and guitarist in the roots tradition. "We've never played publicly together, but whenever we get together, somebody always pulls out a guitar.

"Every one of us, except my brother Bill (a CJN entertainment writer), has albums out, but he's actually the best musician of all of us, but he chooses to channel his art form through his words and not music."

Gladstone's adult sons, Jeremy and Michael, and his daughter, Lindsey, all inherited the musical gene. The eldest, Jeremy, is the only one, though, who went into the family business – he's in the rock band Zygote.

Gladstone, who is a self-taught musician, has four albums out. The latest is A Time for New Beginnings, available at www.brianglad-stone.ca. All his CDs are acoustic.

He says his music has been influenced by everything he likes. Most of his radio play comes from country stations, although he doesn't consider himself a country artist. His vocal stylings have been compared to Bob Dylan's.

"I was weaned on Dylan, like everybody of my generation. He's one of the best lyricists… that is a compliment," he says.

For 25 years, Gladstone worked as a research engineer – making his mark in the high-end audio industry. Two and a half years ago, he walked away from that world to pursue music full time.

"I have a lot more responsibilities dealing with my life and making ends meet, but I think it is a worthwhile trade because I have the freedom for me to set my agenda of what works for me around what I need to write, when I need to tour and when I need to nurture my creative spirit," he says.

> Gladstone has been compared to Bob Dylan

When he's not on tour this summer, he's heading to the East Coast, where he plans to write songs for his new CD. Recording begins this fall. He writes his songs simultaneously, as opposed to starting one and finishing another, he says. It works for him, with all the songs coming together in the end to create a coherence to an album.

"I try to write for all peoples," says Gladstone. "I think if you are Jewish, or whatever your persuasion is, the messages are the same for everybody. I'm not a very religious person, but my parents were very good at making me understand our heritage, our culture and how our people have been persecuted since the beginning of time.

"I feel very proud to come from a bloodline that has fought and become stronger. I don't think it is reflected specifically in the lyrics, but it is reflected in the fact that the strongest of our culture has survived, and I feel very happy that I can be part of it."

Gladstone is very much into giving back, to his community and to the next generation of musicians.

He founded a non-profit organization called the Association of Artists for a Better World. It sponsors a number of projects, including the Concert for Peace held annually at Mel Lastman Square, across the street from where Gladstone lives.

The sixth annual concert takes place on Aug. 18. As well as promoting the concert, Gladstone will perform that day. He describes the event as a free day of roots and world music with themes of peace.

"I still feel very privileged that I have a public voice, a public stage and the ability and the opportunity to use my words to make a difference – always, which I try to do. I'm happy to be here and grateful for the opportunity. I have fun every day," he says.

FOUNDATION DIRECTOR

The Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Vancouver is the endowment program of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. Established in 1989, the Foundation currently has assets of over $25 million in nearly 300 endowment funds. In the fiscal year ending 2007, the Foundation distributed over $800,000 in grants through its restricted and unrestricted funds to a wide range of organizations in areas as diverse as education, youth development and arts and culture.

The Foundation is looking for a Director to manage an energized program of outreach and solicitation to build endowment resources for the Jewish Federation and larger Jewish community. The Director will work together with the Associate Executive Director of Financial Resource Development to facilitate the philanthropic giving of donors and their families. The Director will manage all functions of the Foundation including board governance and supervision of Foundation staff as a member of the management team.

The Federation has made the Foundation's growth a priority, and the growth of the Foundation is an integral factor in the community's emerging directions and goals. Goals for the Foundation include; enhancing the visibility and attractiveness of the Foundation and its programs and services, facilitating significant growth in the number of dollars and funds, applying a disciplined approach to prospecting and donor cultivation and ensuring an infrastructure that can support effective stewardship and donor satisfaction.

The successful candidate will have a minimum of 5-7 years professional management experience in a not-for-profit setting and outstanding written and oral communication skills coupled with strong interpersonal skills. An understanding of and experience with planned giving programs and instruments is preferred as is an advanced degree in a relevant field. A demonstrated commitment to Jewish communal life and institutions is required. If this exciting opportunity interests you please forward your resume to;

Mideast, Holocaust figure in Ronald Reagan's diaries

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ronald Reagan, the 40th president of the United States, diligently kept a daily diary during his term of office from 1981 to '89. His observations, written in a flat, staccato style that will never be confused with literature, have been published under the title of The Reagan Diaries, edited by Douglas Brinkley, a professor of history at Tulane University.

Reagan's diaries, though, shed light on himself and his policies. The Middle East was one of the subjects that piqued his interest, and in this respect, he mentions Israel, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and the Palestinians.

Dealing as well with contemporary events connected to the Holocaust, Reagan wrote of his visits to a former concentration camp and a cemetery in Germany where the dead of the dreaded Waffen SS force were buried.

In one of his first entries, Reagan expressed annoyance with American Jews who opposed the sale of advanced U.S. reconnaissance aircraft to Saudi Arabia.

As he put it, "I'm disturbed by the reaction… in the Jewish community… It must be plain to them [that] they've never had a better friend of Israel in the [White House] than they have now." He added, "We have assured the Israelis we will do whatever is needed to see that any help to the Arab states does not change the balance of power between them and the Arabs."

He returned to the topic when Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin, visited him in Washington, D.C. "While he didn't give up his objection [to the proposed sale], he mellowed. By the time the meetings and the state dinner ended, he said this was the warmest reception he'd ever had from a Pres. of the U.S."

But just a few months later, after Reagan slapped an arms embargo on Israel for having annexed the Golan Heights, Begin went ballistic and hurled accusations at the United States. Reagan's response was succinct: "First thing this A.M. a message from Israel – an angry denunciation of us with charges of betrayal and anti-Semitism. Obviously, it is intended for the public to arouse our own Jewish community against us."

Taking issue with Israel's bombing of Iraq's French-built nuclear reactor, Reagan noted, "I can understand [Begin's] fear but feel he took the wrong option. He should have told us and the French, we could have done something to remove the threat. However, we are not turning on Israel – that would be an invitation for the Arabs to attack."

Despite his objection to Israel's air raid, Reagan had no illusions about the Iraqi regime. "The truth is the Arab indignation on behalf of Iraq is a waste. Saddam Hussein is a 'no good nut,' and I think he was trying to build a nuclear weapon. He has called for the destruction of Israel…"

As much as he disliked Saddam, Reagan admired King Hussein of Jordan. "I really like him," he wrote. "He is our hope to lead the Arab side and the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] in negotiating with the Israelis."

Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon in was a source of tension between Israel and the United States. Describing a meeting with Israel's foreign minister, Yitzhak Shamir, he observed: "I was rather severe regarding Israels [sic] continued shelling and bombing of W. Beirut and in effect delivered an ultimatum."

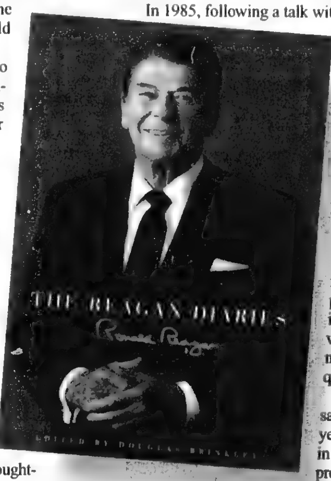
A year later, when Shamir was prime minister, Reagan told him that he wanted to strengthen relations with moderate Arab states so as to "help bring peace to the area."

Like previous presidents, Reagan regarded Israel's policy of building settlements in the West Bank as counter-productive to peace. "Had a brief on the West Bank. There can be no question but that Israel has a well-thought-out plan to take over the W.B."

Reagan was concerned that a war pitting Israel against Syria loomed on the horizon. "The possibility of an Israeli-Syrian [plus Soviet] confrontation cannot be ruled out. Armageddon in the prophecies begins with the gates of Damascus being assailed."

On July 19, 1984, after conferring with B'nai Brith officials, Reagan wrote, "They are pleased with our positions and our relationship with Israel."

Yet shortly afterward, Reagan voiced irritation with Israel concerning its military presence in southern Lebanon. "They are horrendous due to their extended [military] deployment. We want to help them but they'll have to demonstrate some willingness to help themselves."



In 1985, following a talk with Israel's defence minister, Yitzhak Rabin, whom he misidentified as foreign minister, Reagan again raised the issue of U.S. arms sales to certain Arab states.

"I tried to impress on him why we feel we must sell weapons to the moderate Arab states if we are ever to bring them around to making permanent peace with Israel. It isn't an easy sell even when I tell them we'll never let Israel lose its qualitative edge."

The question of arms sales was on the agenda yet again when Reagan, in a meeting with Israel's president, Chaim Herzog, said that Israel should stop sending weapons to its enemy, Iran. "We did suggest Israel shouldn't be selling arms to Iran."

Reagan had high praise for Shimon Peres, who was Israel's prime minister when he met with him at the White House in 1986. "I admire him very much and I am sorry the [political] rotation agreement will see him replaced with Shamir." In another reference to Peres, Reagan wrote, "He's done a great job seeing the way toward peace in the Middle East."

In 1988, Reagan's attention was drawn to the West Bank once more. "Report that Israel was planning new settlements in the West Bank, commented, 'We are going to try and talk them out of that.'"

Reagan agreed with his secretary of state, George Shultz, that the PLO leader, Yasser Arafat, should not be issued a visa to visit the United States: "Israel is very happy. Arab states are upset about it. Our law is very clear on the subject. George is right and the visa should be denied."

Commenting on a raid Israel conducted in northern Lebanon in 1988, Reagan fumed, "We think it's stupid."

After Kurt Waldheim – an intelligence officer in the German army during World War II – was elected Austria's president, Reagan wrote, "Framed a letter to [him] but avoided using the word 'congratulations.' The press would have a run with that because of the charges against him having a Nazi background."

Reagan's decision to visit the Bitburg cemetery in Germany caused a wave of indignation and prompted him to remark, "The press continues to chew away… on my supposed insensitivity… They are really sucking blood and finding every Jewish person of Jewish faith they can who will denounce me."

Reagan's vice-president, George Bush, supported the trip to Bitburg. "I was very proud of your stand," he noted. "It's not easy, but you are right!!"

Reagan invited the Jewish novelist and Holocaust survivor, Elie Wiesel, to accompany him to Germany. "[Wiesel] said yes, except that he won't be present at the cemetery."

After Bitburg, Reagan went to the former Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. "This was an emotional experience," he wrote.

Referring to Bitburg, he wrote, "Here I made the speech I hoped would refute the phony charges that had been made. I declared we must not forget and we must pledge, 'never again.'"

Commenting on his appearance at a Holocaust memorial day in Washington, long before his visit to Bitburg, Reagan wrote, "It was an emotional experience for them and us. I know I choked up a couple of times while I was addressing them."

The Reagan Diaries are plain and unadorned, hardly the stuff of great political writing, but they add to our knowledge of Reagan's eight-year presidency.

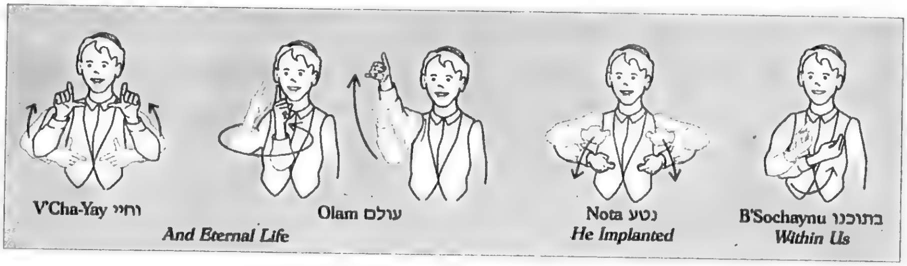
How-to guide teaches blessings in sign language

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern



A new handbook shows the deaf how to perform bar mitzvah blessings in American Sign Language.

The guidebook is produced by Our Way, the New York-based outreach program for the Jewish deaf and hearing impaired, part of the larger National Jewish Council for the Disabled program sponsored by the Orthodox Union. The four-page handbook is easy to understand.

OUR WAY/NJCD
SIGNS OF BAR MITZVAH
Handbook for Jewish Deaf and Hard of Hearing Celebrating Bar Mitzvah in Sign Language
Sponsored by Annette and Leo Brown
In Memory of Bina and Louis Brown

Step-by-step translations of five blessings are given in Hebrew, transliterated Hebrew and English, accompanied with a sketch of a boy depicting how each word is signed.

The booklet is available with a suggested $18 donation from Rabbi Eliezer Lederfeind, Our Way's director, at 212-613-8127 or ourway@ou.org.

Our Way has been designing guidebooks for the deaf for the last 15 years. Other manuals include a how-to for lighting Shabbat candles and information on halachic law for deaf people, which deals with issues such as wearing hearing aids on Shabbat and hearing the shofar on the High Holy Days.

The bar mitzvah handbook was sponsored by Leo and Annette Brown. Leo is a CODA, the abbreviation for children of deaf adults.

"He very much wanted to make something for a bar mitzvah boy to be said orally and in sign language," said Rabbi Lederfeind. He is a hearing CODA with two deaf and four hearing children.

There are two ways of raising a deaf child: signing or oral, Rabbi Lederfeind said. The deaf child either communicates non-verbally through sign language or learns to speak with the aid of speech therapy, lip reading and, more recently, with the help of a cochlear implant.

Cochlear implants, pronounced kok-lee-uhr, are small electronic devices that help deaf or hearing-impaired people hear by converting sounds into electrical impulses and sending them to the auditory nerve. The device has two parts, one that sits behind the ear and one that is surgically implanted under the skin.

These implants were developed in the mid-1980s and are becoming more common, he said, and slowly replacing signing as the method of choice for raising a deaf child.

"It's a new world," Rabbi Lederfeind said. "Technology has changed everyone's life."

He said that deaf Jews often feel isolated. Our Way runs programs, such as Shabbatonim, to counter this.

"Sometimes you can be sitting next to a deaf person and there can be a wall between you," Rabbi Lederfeind said. "That's what we're trying to break down. [The manuals] accomplish two things: the deaf people learn about Judaism and the hearing people learn about deafness."

Our Way has a Canadian branch located in Toronto.

For deaf Jews, the "greatest loss is not their hearing – it's their lack of Jewish heritage," said Toronto Our Way representative Joely Bernstein. She was raised by Jewish deaf parents and signing was her first language.

She said parents have a lot to deal with when raising a deaf child, such as choosing a method of communication and the type of school to attend, and as a result, Judaism often falls by the wayside.

"Or they bring the deaf child to services but they think, 'There's no way my son can have a bar mitzvah, he's deaf.' But it's not like that," said Bernstein.

"We have interpreters who are fluent in Hebrew and who know the services, whether it be Reform, Conservative or Orthodox. I get called all the time about interpreters."

Bernstein said the Canadian Our Way chapter has about 100 people of all ages on the mailing list and urges anyone who can benefit from Our Way to contact her.

"If you are Jewish and deaf, you are part of our family," she said.

In the coming Jewish new year, Bernstein said Our Way has many plans, including a Holocaust education series featuring deaf, signing survivors and a Shabbaton featuring deaf rabbis and other Jewish role models.

Is a two-state solution still viable?

By LESLIE SUSSER

Analysis

For years the "two-state solution," envisioning Israel and Palestine living side by side in peace, has been the almost exclusive formula for resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But the Hamas takeover of Gaza last month is challenging conventional wisdom. Following the coup, politicians and pundits are expressing grave doubts about the viability of the two-state concept and are floating new alternatives.

The problem is simple: With Hamas in control in Gaza and the rival Fatah ruling the West Bank, how can a unified Palestinian state be established in the two territories?

In other words, with Hamas' growing strength and Fatah's weakness reflected in the Gaza takeover, how can Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah make a two-state deal with Israel that would stick?

The foreign ministers of Egypt and Jordan are due in Israel this month, representing the Arab League in its first visit to the country. The delegation will discuss the threat posed by Hamas and Islamic extremism, as well as the 22-nation league's peace proposal. The plan offers full Arab recognition of Israel in exchange for its full withdrawal from lands captured in the 1967 Six Day War, repatriation of Palestinian refugees and the creation of a Palestinian state.

But the Arab League plan is unlikely to provide a framework to circumvent the Hamas-Fatah split. Indeed, it will likely only get off the ground if there is significant progress on the Israeli-Palestinian track.

The following are some of the new ideas that would circumvent the changes on the Palestinian side of the equation:

The return of the Jordanian option

For many years the Labor Party in Israel advocated solving the Palestinian problem in a deal with Jordan, which would take back most of the West Bank, annex Gaza and establish a Jordanian-Palestinian federation or confederation. This idea, without the Gaza element, is now enjoying something of revival. A number of conservative American think tanks are suggesting some form of political connection between Jordan and the West Bank as the most practical option in the new circumstances.

The Palestinian radicals in Gaza would be circumvented, and the moderates in the West Bank would be buttressed by a union with the pro-Western Hashemite monarchy. Privately, some senior Fatah people, once mortal enemies of the Hashemites, claim to be interested. Former Jordanian Prime Minister Abdel Salam Majali, who reportedly backs the confederation idea, maintains that it has significant grassroots support.

Palestinian research seems to bear him out. A recent poll conducted by Khalil Shikaki of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research found that as many as 42 per cent of Palestinians would back a union with Jordan.

But here's the problem: the Jordanian king and current prime minister are dead-set against the federation-confederation proposal.

"We reject the formula of confederation and federation, and we believe that proposing this issue at this specific point in time is a conspiracy against both Palestine and Jordan," King Abdullah declared in early July.

The non-Palestinian East Bank elite around Abdullah have no interest in co-opting more than two million West Bank Palestinians into the kingdom and significantly worsening the demographic balance against them. Nor do they relish the prospect of taking Israel's place in policing radical hot spots such as Nablus or Hebron.

The regional solution

For the Israeli right, the Hamas takeover in Gaza illustrates what it sees as the inherent frailty of the two-state approach.

"The Oslo process is predicated on the need for a Palestinian state," says Benny Elon, chairman of the hawkish National Union, "but everything that has happened since shows that it would destabilize the entire region."

Elon proposes using the current West Bank-Gaza divide to solve the West Bank question with Jordan and the Gaza problem with Egypt, even though neither Arab state has shown the slightest inclination to be involved in this way.

In Elon's scheme, Israel and Jordan would negotiate over sharing functional responsibilities for the West Bank, West Bank Palestinians would become citizens of Jordan and vote there, Jewish settlers would be Israeli citizens and vote for the Knesset. In Gaza, the main thrust would be to put an end to Palestinian "refugeehood" by offering refugees a choice between a lump sum and relocation abroad or rehousing in Gaza.

"The goal," Elon says, "should be to get rid of the Gaza refugee camps over a 10-year period."

Two states in stages

The idea here, favoured by the Israeli government, the Israeli left and the U.S. administration, is to maintain the two-state approach but defer its implementation. Israel and the Palestinian moderates under Abbas would negotiate the contours of a final peace deal, with the understanding that any agreements would become operational only when circumstances permitted.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice calls this a "shelf deal" – that is, a deal to be negotiated, shelved and only used when conditions are ripe. The most outspoken advocate of this approach on the Israeli side is Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who argues that once Palestinian moderates are reassured about the kind of final peace deal being offered, they will have a strong incentive to take the steps they need to get there. One example cited is the need to disarm the militias and clamp down on terror.

Under this scenario, the boycott on Hamas in Gaza would continue and everyday life in the West Bank would significantly improve, with credit for the change going to the moderates. The problem is that Hamas is unlikely to allow any of this to happen without a major fight. And that could mean more terror rather than less.

Long-term ceasefire with Hamas

Some Israelis, such as the former Mossad chief Ephraim Halevi and former Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben Ami, advocate negotiating a long-term cease-fire, or hudna, with Hamas. Their approach is based on the assumption that no matter how much Israel and the international community do to strengthen Abbas, he will be too weak to deliver.

They conclude that any serious Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking will have to find a way to include Hamas and allow for its input in the process. Hamas and Fatah would be encouraged to settle their differences, so the Palestinians can present a united front in negotiations with Israel. The goal would be to draw Hamas into an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal, which it might not like but would accept for want of a better choice.

Clearly the Hamas takeover in Gaza has led to a shake-up in political thinking on the Israeli-Palestinian track. But just one month after everything changed, it's too early to say whether any of this new thinking will take root or have a significant impact on the conflict.

B.C. fighter is the ultimate knock-out

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Sarah Kaufman kicked, punched and grappled her way to the top.

The 21-year-old is one of the best Canadian mixed martial arts fighters with a professional record of five wins, no draws and no losses.

She fought in the first female mixed martial arts fights in both Manitoba and in Quebec.

Mixed martial arts, or ultimate fighting, is a blend of muay thai, boxing, grappling, wrestling, jujitsu and other fight forms that allows fighters to use a wide variety of techniques.

"There's no eye poking, gouging, biting or hair pulling, but other than that, it's pretty much anything goes," said Kaufman, whose father is Jewish.

She has been an ultimate fighter for 4½ years. Kaufman works full time and trains at Zuma Martial Arts in Victoria, B.C.

After two years of pre-medicine studies at the University of Victoria, with the goal of becoming a cardiovascular surgeon, Sarah left school to pursue fighting full time.

She now teaches and is the office manager at Zuma, and she trains for about 20 hours a week.

"I love winning. I always want to improve on something from the last fight," Kaufman said.

Mixed martial arts started to gain momentum in 1993 with the creation of U.S.-based Ultimate Fighting Championship organization.

"Within the last six or seven years, it really started to blow up," Kaufman said. She cited the advent of reality television shows such as The Ultimate Fighter and Fight Girl as being partly responsible for the sport's increase in notoriety.

"It's a really popular growing sport, because it involves so many different aspects. There's a huge conditioning aspect. You have to be in really good shape, but you have to have pretty much the full package in terms of being able to do stand-ups, take-downs, take-down defence and fighting on the ground," Kaufman said about the variety of fight skills needed.

"For me, I'm just there to have a good time," she said.

"Everyone's so serious, and I'm smiling and I'm relaxed, and the reason for that is I've trained the hardest I possibly could."

Kaufman has had some air time on the Fight Network, which plans to air her previous fights in full at a later date. Her June 1 fight in Montreal against Valerie Letourneau was aired June 29 on pay-per-view.

"That was my biggest fight," said Kaufman, who was excited to be broadcast on the channel.

Kaufman is currently looking for a corporate sponsor and she hopes to hold a title in mixed martial arts soon.

Her next fight is July 21 in Edmonton against an opponent to be announced.

Businessman saves Kiev soccer club

By NATHAN TSIVLIN
JTA

KIEV— Add another high-profile Jewish businessman from the former Soviet Union to the exclusive fraternity of soccer team owners.

Vadim Rabinovich, president of the Ukrainian Jewish Congress and a major donor to Jewish causes in Ukraine, joined the elite group when he purchased Kiev's second premier club, Arsenal, for an undisclosed amount.

Members already were Grigory Surkis, president of the Ukrainian Football Federation and part owner of Dynamo Kiev, Ukraine's leading soccer club, and Russian billionaire Roman Abramovich, owner of the Chelsea squad in London.

In April, Kiev Mayor Leonid Chernovetsky indicated that Arsenal would be de-listed, or removed from the elite division of Ukrainian soccer, because its maintenance of $8 million (US) a year was too financially draining.

"A close friend called me up and asked me if I wanted to purchase Arsenal, and I said yes," Rabinovich told JTA. Rabinovich bought 97 per cent of shares in the team.

His timing was impeccable. Ukraine recently was awarded the right to co-host Euro 2012, the next biggest soccer tournament after the World Cup. Arsenal plays its home games at Kiev's premiere Olympic Stadium, the venue for the Euro 2012 final. Arsenal has mostly struggled since its founding in 1934, especially in comparison with crosstown rival Dynamo. In the past three seasons, Arsenal has finished no better than sixth in the 16-team Ukrainian Premier League.

Rabinovich hopes his investment can reverse the losing. He says he will bring in "better staff and better players."

"I have high hopes for Arsenal," he said.

His early memories played a role in his decision to purchase Arsenal, Rabinovich said.

"I played football when I was a child, and then later I began concentrating on Jewish matters," he said. Except in North America, the game of soccer is known throughout the world as football.

"Now I have bought a football club, but I will not be pushing aside my involvement in the Ukrainian Jewish community."

It seems the purchase may even have boosted his reputation among Ukrainian Jews.

"I have been president of the Ukrainian Jewish Congress and head of the Israel-Ukraine Committee for many years, but the first thanks I received, from both Jewish and non-Jewish people in the street, was after I bought Arsenal," Rabinovich said.

While the new owner, who holds Israeli citizenship and maintains homes in Israel and Ukraine, would love to see some Israeli players on Arsenal, he is leaving those decisions to his management. "If there happens to be an Israeli player that we like, then we will take him on board," he said.

Looking at next season, Rabinovich said if Arsenal finishes higher than sixth it would be a success.

The dating game

ALMOST FAMOUS

BY JACOB MEDJUCK

They say that as one of our senses weakens, the others often strengthen. From that, I postulate that in the absence of an early social life, I evolved, for a time, into a blind, aggressive capitalist (which some who know me prefer I simply acknowledge as workaholism).

I am a recovering workaholic. And therefore, my week must include a Sabbath. I have to set boundaries on my work schedule. I have to be careful to avoid working socially – which is difficult, as my work is mostly social. But it's never a problem to drive home from an event, since it's likely I didn't go out in the first place.

If you study on the weekends, you will excel in your grades. And if you do not start dating until university, you will ultimately have a dazzling sea monkey tank into your late 20s. Or you may get married out of the gate, ending up being beaten by, or beating up, someone pretty while you learn the ABCs of patience and privilege that are generally required in a mature relationship.

But my need for strict behaviour did not come by choice or request, but because of geography.

When I grew up in the Maritimes, there were four Jewish boys and two Jewish girls our age – two beautiful girls with far better taste than we males merited – and therefore, we had no Jewish girls to date. And since we had to date Jewish, we did not date at all.

It was not until university that we'd share in the trials and troublesome joys of dating or benefit from the personal growth of that activity. This left plenty of time for other labours, which yielded these results: by the time we entered university abroad, already with professional resumes, we were instead like show dogs with fancy papers and no survival training.

"Luck" can be defined as the moment when opportunity meets ability. And once we were out of the Maritimes, the occasion to mix with Jewish females crossed paths with our Grade 3 dating skills and we small-town Jews were quickly without "luck."

From ages six to 16, we'd had only a few short weeks each summer to dance with the wash of Ontario Jews who came east for camp – not nearly enough time to execute any ethical technique. Camp always felt like a bank job gone wrong: someone shot a cop and the alarm went off early. We'd just grab what we could and run. (It wasn't the delicate realization of courtship that Oprah promoted.)

University was frustrating in that our contemporaries were learning to open the doors of industry, while we were learning to open doors for girls.

Fighting for an edge in our new worlds, Louis exercised, honing his physical prowess. Daniel developed his mind, attending Harvard and Princeton, while I spent time in stand-up, struggling as a chemist of words. Morris, however, refused to exercise his body or mind, insisting that the perfect mix tape would make a woman remove her top. It required not just an ideal musical selection, but songs in specific order.

Life had thrown us curves.

Evolving into modest Jews and decent suitors took an underdeveloped and mutually exclusive effort, while we lived remotely on the continental fringes.

Morris eventually sang his mix tape – and he is now a cantor and a proud father. Louis is also a soon-to-be father, and I heard that Daniel was dating a dignitary.

It turned out OK for me – the jokes were funny – but I was not. And thus I became a writer for others. However, since discovering that this plan was not the winning pheromone of love, I simply joined a gym.

Let there be light – exercise.

Don't be fooled by Hamas charm offensive

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

There is a frightening amount of disinformation about Israel being promoted in some media circles. For example, this column recently spotlighted a piece by Canadian writer Naomi Klein, published in the Nation magazine (where she is a columnist), the Guardian newspaper, and in Canadian alternative weeklies, including Vancouver's Georgia Straight and Toronto's Now magazine. Klein erroneously claimed that the recent growth in Israel's economy was due to its military arms exports, an argument designed to paint Israel as a military aggressor and oppressor of the Palestinians.

The Nation continued this misinformation about Israel in a June 18 editorial, "Endless Occupation?" which discussed rethinking the two-state solution in favour of binationalism – a solution that spells the end of Israel as a Jewish state. In reply to complaints about the editorial's factual inaccuracies (for instance, blaming Israel for failure to achieve peace with the Palestinians), the editors responded with even more distortions.

The Nation claimed that Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh, in a Guardian op-ed ("1967: Our rights have to be recognized," June 6), wrote that he "would accept a two-state solution."

In fact, Haniyeh wrote that the then-Hamas-led Palestinian Authority "envisages the establishment of an independent state on all the Palestinian land occupied by Israel in 1967, the dismantling of all the settlements in the West Bank, the release of all 11,000 Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails and the recognition of the right of all Palestinian refuges to return to their homes."

Nowhere did Haniyeh write about Hamas accepting Israel. Some have argued that Haniyeh has "implicitly" accepted Israel. That too is nonsense, as indicated by Haniyeh's insistence that all Palestinian refugees – numbering more than 3.5 million, according to the UN agency responsible for them – be allowed to return "to their homes" in what is now Israel. In other words, Israel would cease to exist as a Jewish state in accordance with Hamas' charter, which decrees that Israel be destroyed.

Haniyeh's wording in the Guardian was sufficiently vague and coded as to leave the baseless impression that Hamas has "moderated" its rejection of Israel.

To understand just how illusory this impression is, one has only to consider what Haniyeh and other Hamas officials have said repeatedly since coming to power – they refuse to recognize Israel's right to exist on any part of "Islamic" (not Palestinian) land.

In a June 12, 2006 interview in Der Spiegel ("We want peace and stability"), Haniyeh was pressed specifically about Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel. When asked what he'd do if Israel withdrew to the pre-1967 borders and relinquished east Jerusalem, etc., Haniyeh offered only a hudna, or long-term ceasefire.

Hamas is currently engaged in a charm offensive following its involvement in the release of BBC journalist Alan Johnston, with op-eds by Hamas officials appearing recently in the Guardian, the Los Angeles Times and even the Israel daily Ha'aretz.

But no one should be fooled about Hamas' rigid Islamic ideology, or its insistence on using violence against Israel as justified "resistance."

Israel denies report of soldier's death

Red Cross refused access to PoWs

By JUSTIN SULSKY
JTA

NEW YORK — Israeli officials dismissed a Lebanese newspaper report that one of the two Israeli soldiers taken captive last summer by Hezbollah is dead.

Saturday's report in the An-Nahar newspaper quoted anonymous German diplomatic sources who said Lebanon's Free Patriotic Movement leader Michael Aoun told them one of the soldiers is dead. Aoun reportedly did not identify which of the two soldiers, Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser, was alive. Their abduction on July 12, 2006 sparked last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel.

On Sunday, Israeli President Shimon Peres said Israel's position is that both reservists are alive.

Family members of the captive soldiers dismissed the newspaper report, saying they were used to such attempts to play with their emotions.

"This report isn't worth anything to me," Karnit Goldwasser told Army Radio. "They can't play with my feelings."

Federal government resumes aid to PA

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canada has partially restored funding and humanitarian aid to the Palestinians.

Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay announced last week that the government, through the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), has reinstated $8 million in assistance to help Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party and the Palestinian Authority in the West Bank.

A year ago, Canada was one of the first countries to suspend funding to the Palestinians – holding back $30 million in aid – after Hamas won Palestinian elections.

Canada, which considers Hamas a terrorist group, will also send another $1 million for explicit humanitarian aid to Gaza, to be administered by the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Peter MacKay

After meetings with King Abdullah II of Jordan last month, in which the king pleaded for Canada and the West to help stabilize Abbas' government, it was widely speculated that Prime Minister Stephen Harper would restore funding to the PA.

At the time, Harper said, "It's important that moderate Middle East leaders have support. We must use negotiations instead of force. Now that Hamas is not the government… we support Abbas."

In a statement announcing the renewed funding, MacKay praised Abbas and his prime minister, Salaam Fayad, for their government's "commitment to non-violence, recognition of Israel, and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations."

MacKay added that Canada recognizes "the fundamental challenges facing [Abbas and Fayad] in such areas as governance and the rule of law, and hopes that Canada's support will contribute to much-needed reforms."

Canadian aid will focus on helping with social and economic development, security assistance and democratic promotion.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Sanctions Denounced

TORONTO — Four more Canadian universities have added their names to the list of schools denouncing a proposed boycott by Britain's largest post-secondary teachers' union. The presidents of the University of Waterloo, the University of Windsor, the University of Guelph and McMaster university came out last month against the proposed boycott by the University and College Union, saying it was contrary to the principles of academic discourse. The statements brought the number of Canadian universities that have denounced the proposed boycott to 21.

300 Attend Vigil

TORONTO — Some 300 people attended a vigil for three kidnapped Israeli soldiers that was held July 16 outside Israel's consulate in Toronto. Speakers in support of Gilad Shalit, who was taken to Gaza by Hamas last June, and for Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, who were kidnapped by Hezbollah last July, included Consul General Ya'acov Brosh and Josh Cooper, executive director of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). The event was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, B'nai Brith, CIJA and Mothers for MIAs..

Grant for Camping

NEW YORK — The Foundation for Jewish Camping has received an $11.2-million grant to start a preteen camping program. The money from the Jim Joseph Foundation targets preteens in communities west of the Rockies. It will provide 3,000 U.S. children with two summers at Jewish overnight camp. In early May, the foundation announced another $15-million gift from a Chicago donor. The new grant will give $1,800 to first-time campers to attend a non-profit camp for at least three weeks. Kids returning for another year get $1,000.

Cash for Survivors

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference will spend an extra $67 million (US) on programs for Nazi victims over the next three years. The new funds will add to the $300 million it already planned to spend on such programs from funds acquired from the sale of unclaimed Holocaust-era Jewish property in the former East Germany. The new money is meant to make up for the decline in funding for social welfare programs due to the end of allocations from the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC), the Claims Conference said.

College Raps Boycott

NEW ORLEANS — Dillard University, a black college in New Orleans, has condemned a proposal by Britain's largest post-secondary teacher's union to boycott Israel. "We find such efforts antithetical to the values of academic freedom and civility," president Marvalene Hughes wrote to the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding, which promotes black-Jewish ties. She said Dillard "unequivocally detests the effort to silence, isolate, discount and ignore academic values of free expression and open discourse."

Humanistic Judaism Founder Dies in Crash

RABAT — The founder of Humanistic Judaism, Rabbi Sherwin Wine, 79, died July 21 in a car crash in Morocco.

Rabbi Sherwin Wine

Born in Detroit in 1928 to Conservative parents, Rabbi Wine went to Reform rabbinical school before founding the first Humanistic congregation, the Birmingham Temple, in the Detroit suburb of Birmingham in 1963. He helped establish the Society for Humanistic Judaism in 1969, gradually building it into a worldwide movement with some 40,000 members. He retired in 2003.

A self-professed atheist, he was the author of several books, including Humanistic Judaism and Judaism Beyond God. He was in Morocco this summer writing a book on living a meaningful, moral life without faith for guidance.

He and partner Richard McMains were near Essaouira, Morocco, when the taxi they were riding in was struck by another car. Rabbi Wine was killed instantly and McMains was hospitalized in stable condition.

Tory fleshes out school funding pledge

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Provincial Conservative leader John Tory promised last week that if elected this fall, his party will spend even more money than previously promised on education, and that he'll appoint a commission to evaluate how best to integrate private and faith-based schools into the public system.

At a July 23 press conference at Queen's Park, Tory and Conservative opposition education critic Frank Klees elaborated on their party's pledge, unveiled in June, to bring private schools into the public system and to increase funding to the system by an additional $800 million in the first year of a Conservative government.

Last week, Tory upped that amount, pledging his party would inject "a minimum" of $2.4 billion into the public education system by the fourth year of its mandate.

As well, he said he will appoint a "Public Education Fairness Implementation Commission" that would be chaired by former Ontario premier Bill Davis and would convene immediately after a Conservative victory to study the issue using, among other methods, other province's public schools as reference points.

LEADERSHIP MATTERS
Expanding Public Education

John Tory and Frank Klees address the media last week at Queen's Park to unveil new details about their party's promise to fund faith-based schools.

The Davis-led commission would also oversee a pilot project for the 2008-09 school year, in which some private schools would effectively become part of the public system, though Tory gave no details about how the pilot project would work.

After a "prudent" evaluation period, the commission would set out its recommendations to "set the standards and shape of our final policy," Tory said.

Klees and Tory said they believed full implementation of a "new, inclusive public school system" could occur by the fall of 2010.

However, Tory warned that his plan would subject any faith-based and private schools who wished to join the public education system to "clear and reasonable conditions."

There will be three basic requirements for private or faith-based schools to meet under the plan: the adoption of the Ontario common curriculum, mandatory standardized testing and "teacher credentialing" that meets the standards of the Ontario College of Teachers.

Tory said specifics about how private and public schools would share revenue, materials and accountability would need to be worked out by the commission.

Community's poor face real hardships

JEWISH POVERTY: A persistent problem

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Simon Kalkstein, manager of the Gordon S. Wolfe branch of Jewish Family & Child, located in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, often sees clients having to make agonizing choices.

"Do they pay their rent or their utilities? Do they pay their phone bill or buy extra food? They are choosing between basic necessities," says Kalkstein, a social worker who has worked at the downtown branch of what used to be called Jewish Family & Child Service for 20 years.

He also sees single mothers on Ontario Works, a program that provides income and employment assistance for people in temporary financial need, who have to decide whether or not it's profitable to work an occasional shift.

"From the $9 an hour they may earn, Ontario Works takes off half. From those earnings, they need to pay for transportation, and they need to buy some working clothes. They want to get ahead, but the way the government is structured, it's not easy."

Of the 380 client files Kalkstein has at his branch, he says, at least two-thirds are working poor or on fixed incomes such as Ontario Works or ODSP (Ontario Disability Support Program). "Some of the case files are individuals, but some are families, so the numbers [of people in poverty] are actually higher."

Things are harder now than they were 20 years ago when he arrived at the branch, he says. "The case loads are larger, the city is bigger, and subsidized housing has not kept up the pace."

Ed Segalowitz, vice-president of budget and allocations for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, notes that the 2001 Census Analysis Series on the Jewish Poor in the Toronto Jewish Community, prepared in 2004 by Charles Shahar and Tina Rosenbaum, gives a sense of the extent of poverty in the community.

Poverty Status
Toronto Jewish Population
(Historical Summary)

Census Year	Poor		Not Poor		Total
	#	%	#	%	#
2001	19,745	11.0	159,170	89.0	178,915
1991	18,870	11.6	143,790	88.4	162,660
1971	13,075	12.3	92,920	87.7	105,995

"[The report] is outdated, but we're told that 20,000 Jews live at or below the poverty line – the National Council of Welfare sets the poverty line as $28,500 for a family of three – which is about 11 per cent of the Jewish population," Segalowitz says.

"That is a minimum of 11 per cent, because seniors in long-term care are not included."

He acknowledges that the poverty rate among Jews is lower than the 16 per cent seen in the general population, "but it is still 20,000 people, which includes about 3,000 children and 5,800 seniors."

He notes that Toronto has 40 per cent of the total Jewish poor in the country. As well, about one-quarter of Toronto's Jewish families led by single mothers are economically disadvantaged.

"There are 4,000 working poor in the community whose incomes are below the low-income cut-off line. If the [head of the family] of three does not earn at least $16 an hour, the family is poor."

The report also found that about 66 per cent of young adults between 15 and 24 who live alone or with non-relatives are poor, and about 32 per cent of unattached Jews are poor.

Among immigrant families, about one-fifth rely on government benefits for at least a decade after their arrival in Canada, and the highest level of poverty is found among immigrants from the former Soviet Union, followed by those born in eastern Europe.

Seniors, the report states, comprise the largest disadvantaged group, with about 30 per cent of poor Jews being 65 years or older. Senior women are almost twice as likely to be disadvantaged than men.

Teri Kay, executive director of the Ontario Network for the Prevention of Elder Abuse, says that because seniors are more at risk when it comes to health problems, they are seriously affected by living in poverty.

"Quality of life, health and income levels are all interconnected. If most of their money is going to rent, they're not able to purchase items that improve their quality of life."

Seniors comprise the largest disadvantaged group

Even if seniors own their own home, Kay says, their income is often not enough to keep up with maintenance and taxes. "They could be house rich and cash poor."

Richard Cummings, Jewish Family and Child's executive director, says that many of the people that his organization serves have family incomes below the poverty line, even with help. "With a top-up from [our agency], their salary comes to $23,000. That is about $5,000 below the poverty line."

In order to help staff and volunteers understand the plight of those living in poverty, Cummings says, he has them break down the expenses for a family of three and figure out how they could live Jewishly on their earnings.

"They can barely cover expenses, never mind any extras. Their children need computers so they have access to information, and the families need resources to celebrate Jewish holidays, buy kosher food, and send their kids to Hebrew school and camp. There is a huge premium to living Jewishly," Cummings says.

"Their identification with the Jewish community also depends on where they live, so they look for housing along the Bathurst corridor from Sheppard to Steeles. It is a struggle, though, to find appropriate and reasonable housing in that area."

The report confirms that since that strip includes about 5,500 Jewish poor, it's one of the areas with the highest levels of Jewish poverty.

The need for financial support is what usually leads clients to his door, "but most have been struggling with other issues long before they get to us," Cummings says.

"Alcohol, drugs, undiagnosed mental health issues or family violence are all reasons why people could be unemployed or underemployed," he adds.

Kalkstein says that by the time people see him, they are often frustrated and defeated. "I have a young woman in her 30s who applies for at least three jobs a week and is refused every time. There are problems here that go beyond the financial."

More people live marginally downtown, he says. "There are more psychologically disadvantaged people living in subsidized housing and rooming houses than there are up north."

When people look for single causes of poverty, they're not looking at the whole equation, Cummings says, since many reasons are to blame.

"Education is an important protection factor, and those that drop out of school early are vulnerable," he says.

Eric Kirsh, supervisor of Jewish Family and Child's financial assistance and rehabilitation program, says the statistics belie the myth that poverty does not exist in the Jewish community.

"It is a little bit lower than the broader community, but it is definitely there," he says.

"Another myth is that if people pull up their socks, snap out of it and try harder, they won't be poor. No one chooses, though, to live such a life."

His organization sees a lot of people who have good work histories but for one reason or another have fallen on hard times.

"Families face changes in life, and they suddenly find themselves unable to pay their bills. If a woman has to leave her marriage, her whole life could be altered dramatically. By the grace of God, these people could be us."

Next time: The community's response.

UJA Federation can keep grant, province says

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The province likely won't ask UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to return a $15-million grant from a controversial government fund-used to support ethno-cultural organizations, federation and government sources say.

Contentious granting practices by the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration were investigated by Auditor General Jim McCarter after Premier Dalton McGuinty asked for a review on May 10 in the wake of mounting pressure to scrutinize the ministry's procedures.

Opposition parties alleged the province was using the grants to reward Liberal-friendly organizations, but McCarter said he found no evidence of this.

Federation was given its grant money to help fund a new Jewish community centre in Vaughan and for redevelopment of existing infrastructure.

An aide to Minister of Government Services Gerry Phillips indicated his office will look into what, if anything, can be done to redress the situation and perhaps reclaim some of the money that was given to the various cultural organizations, but he said it's unlikely the federation would be part of any clawback.

Phillips added the citizenship and immigration portfolio to his duties as the minister for government services after Mike Colle resigned as citizenship minister in the wake of McCarter's report.

Colle's ministry doled out more than $32 million in unconditional grants to numerous non-profit ethno-cultural organizations over the last two fiscal years, with little or no formal procedures in place, and McCarter called on the province to tighten up ship.

Federation's grant far eclipsed the $3 million received by the Brooklin Community Centre, the ministry's next largest recipient of funding.

"[T]he decision as to who got what was often based on conversations rather than applications," McCarter's report stated.

But while the scathing report, handed in last week, censured the province for a lack of transparency and accountability in how the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration handled its year-end capital grants program, it also lauded federation for being one of the few organizations to provide adequate, detailed paperwork to justify its grant.

"[Federation's] grant application was better than the poor process [engaged in] by other grant seekers. It was a reasonably well-managed application process," Tiina Randoja, a spokesperson in the auditor general's office, told The CJN.

"We have not been contacted by the government and… we do not foresee any future contact [regarding the funding]," English said. "There would be no reason for [the province to seek repayment from federation], because the auditor general himself acknowledged that the funds are being used for the purposes intended and that our request for funding was extremely well-documented."

McCarter's report stopped short of accusing the province of providing money to reward political loyalties.

"We found no evidence that any organization received a grant because it had political ties," it stated before adding that "in some cases those ties did exist, and, when this is combined with a process lacking in openness and controls, it can create the perception of favouritism if the organization ends up obtaining a grant."

In compliance with the report, McGuinty said he was putting an end to the practice of using money from the ministry to provide grants to cultural organizations.

Instead, he said, funding for "ethno-cultural communities" will be administered by the Ministry of Public Infrastructure Renewal.

"Helping newcomers to Ontario, from all over the world, is the right thing to do, and the smart thing to do, but it must be done in an open, transparent and accountable way," McGuinty said.

VisionTV to review policies after airing radical imam

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Despite VisionTV's first instinct to defend its decision to air a lecture last month by an Islamic preacher who called on Muslims to fight jihad either physically or financially, Canadian Jewish groups say the station has since taken the proper steps to prevent something similar from happening again.

The lecture by Israr Ahmad, a fundamentalist who runs a seminary and a bookstore in Lahore, Pakistan, and is known for writings that compare Jews to parasites and describe the Holocaust as divine punishment, aired on VisionTV, a Canadian multi-faith religious channel, on July 14.

Although Ahmad, who heads an organization called Tanzeem-e Islami that advocates turning Pakistan into an Islamic state, didn't voice anti-Semitic views during the show, titled Dil Dil Pakistan, he was quoted as saying "Jihad… can be pursued either with your financial resources or your bodily strength when you go to fight the enemy in the battlefield."

When confronted about the decision to allow such content on Canadian television, Mark Prasuhn, VisionTV's vice-president of programming, told the National Post that Ahmad's comments about fighting jihad didn't contravene the station's policies because the comments were made in a historical context.

"[Mr. Ahmad] does make the point about, you either contribute financially or through your body, and he uses the word fight.

Mischief that could be deadly

A very disturbing report appeared in the Israeli media this past weekend. Moscow is rumoured to be on the verge of concluding the sale of 250 Sukhoi-30 war planes and some 20 airborne fuel tankers to Tehran. The cost of the sale would run into the tens of billions of dollars. Some reports have the Iranians already training on the new fighter aircraft and demanding that the first shipment arrive before the end of 2007.

If the reports of the sale are true, it would significantly alter the military balance of power in the region.The sheer number of aircraft involved would immediately make Iran's air force one of the largest in the Middle East, with a significantly enhanced long-range fighting capability.

The Sukhoi-30 can operate, even in poor weather conditions, at great distances from home base. The inclusion in the sale of the airborne fuel tankers will extend an already prodigious range of some 3,000 kilometres, according to some analysts, by an additional 5,000 kilometres.

Considering the avowed intent of Iran's leaders to wipe the Jewish state off the map, the government of Israel is justifiably worried about these troubling reports. Other governments should be worried too.

The sale of the Sukhois would be the latest major military transaction between the two countries. Russia recently supplied Iran with advanced anti-aircraft systems that are to be used to protect Iranian nuclear installations, presumably of course, from Israeli or western attack.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has embarked on a dangerous double game. His country is a member of the Quartet – along with the United Nations, the United States and the European Union – and publicly committed to advancing peace, security and stability in the Middle East. Yet his policies belie any suggestion that peace and stability are a matter of even slight priority.

He is not unaware of the torrent of Iranian threats to annihilate Israel. Nor is he blind to the feverish Iranian effort to acquire nuclear military capability. By so willingly and it must be added lucratively boosting the Iranian military, Putin has cast his credibility and very integrity into serious doubt.

It is not surprising that rumours of the possible massive arms transaction should have surfaced last weekend, merely hours after reports of a proposed $20 billion arms deal between the United States and Saudi Arabia and an accompanying announcement of a proposed $30-billion contract between the United States and Israel. In a harking back to the worst days of the Cold War, it seems that Russia is determined to frustrate and confound American influence in the region irrespective of the potential price in blood and countless deaths that others might pay for his mischief.

The countries of the West, including Canada, must try to persuade the Kremlin decision-makers to abort this potentially deadly deal.

Israel expressed regret that its bombing of a nearby target damaged the Beirut residence of Theodore Arcand, Canada's ambassador to Israel. However, after Arcand said he was "disappointed in a country that Canada has given so much support to," the Canada-Israel Committee called his comments ill-considered and insulting.

Klein responds to Michaels

Paul Michaels denigrated a recent op-ed article of mine as "total rubbish" ("Klein's thesis on Israel is 'total rubbish,'" CJN, July 5). The op-ed in question was a much-abridged version of a chapter in an upcoming book. The book, The Shock Doctrine: Rise of Disaster Capitalism, is focused on a global phenomenon, but it does contain a major chapter on the extraordinary growth of Israeli's "homeland security" sector. In the chapter, I draw on 75 difference sources, primarily mainstream Israeli business newspapers, as well as the financial reports of the companies themselves. I do not claim that defence and homeland security make up the majority of Israel's gross domestic product. I do demonstrate that they are some of the fastest growing sectors in the Israeli economy.

Michaels attempts to refute this claim by citing fast growth in the telecommunications and Internet sectors. He overlooks the fact that in Israel, security-related services account for large portions of both these sectors. For instance, Verint, a subsidiary of the high-tech giant Comverse, is a leader in the global homeland security sector, supplying video surveillance products to the U.S. Department of Defense and other government agencies. Nice Systems, another Israeli tech company, provides telecommunications and video surveillance software to police departments in major U.S. cities. In 2006, high-tech products accounted for a staggering 60 per cent of Israel's exports.

A half century ago, then-U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower warned of the emergence of the "military-industrial complex," an economic lobby with such a powerful incentive for continued conflict that it threatened to undermine the foundations of democracy. Today, that powerful lobby has vastly expanded its reach. It sells not only weaponry, but everything from privatized health care for soldiers to the tools for fighting a never-ending terrorist threat. Rather than casually dismissing the importance of this new economy, journalists should be willing to closely examine how it is reshaping policy around the world, including inside Israel.

Response to Morton

James Morton, in his essay "British intellectuals not historically anti-Semitic"(Perspectives, CJN, July 19), provides a brief history of increasing acceptance of Jews in British society. The conclusion is that Britain is not an anti-Semitic environment. Morton, however, bemoans the "increasing tide of anti-Israeli (read anti-Semitic) boycotts from the United Kingdom," specifically U.K. academics boycotting Israeli academics. Considering that the United Kingdom is not generally anti-Semitic, even according to Morton, one may question Morton's casual and unsupported assumption that the academic boycotts represent a new form of anti-Semitism. Perhaps they are, as the boycotters claim, opposed to Israeli policy, rather than opposed to Jews. The U.K. academics are not boycotting Brandeis or Yeshiva universities in the United States. It is illogical to assume that any criticism of Israel is a manifestation of anti-Semitism. It is also unproductive, as it shields Israeli policy makers from any criticism, which may be dismissed as motivated by anti-Semitism rather than by genuine disagreement.

Trial not limited to chelationists

The research team carrying out the trial to assess chelation therapy (TACT) wishes to clarify that TACT is funded at a level of $30 million (US), which has been adequate to enrol more than 1,300 patients so far, with many more projected in the United States and Canada ("Heart disease study seeks patients," CJN, July 12). Moreover, TACT has never made any decision to involve only chelationists. In both the United States and Canada, we have included chelation practitioners, conventional cardiologists and academic centres as enrolling sites. The Canadian country leader is Dr. Jean-Claude Tardiff, director of research at the Montreal Heart Institute, for example. We feel that a diverse group of investigators ensures buy-in from all the interested scientific communities and will ensure broad acceptance of the results.

J. B. Barron: the Jew who founded Alberta's oilpatch

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM

February 2007 marked the 60th anniversary of the major oil discovery in Alberta, an anniversary that has been almost forgotten. And little do most Calgarians know that without the actions of one man, the source of their fortunes might well have travelled north to Edmonton.

In 1947 oil started to gush out of Leduc No. 1 well site. Imperial Oil Ltd. executives invited the mayor of Edmonton and other guests to a public celebration on the morning of Feb. 13, 1947, to officially turn on the taps. By that afternoon, black gold was flowing from the well site that changed Alberta's history forever.

Leduc was closer to Edmonton than to Calgary, and as such, oil companies perhaps should have set up their headquarters in the province's capital. But they didn't. They came to Calgary thanks to the chutzpah of one visionary who built Calgary's first high-rise office tower.

After J.B. Barron – perhaps thinking along the lines of the not yet uttered phrase, 'If you build it, they will come" – made the prescient move to erect his building, the oilpatch became anchored in Calgary.

Jacob Bell Barron was born in Winnipeg on New Year's Day in 1888 to Joseph and Elizabeth Barron. His younger brother, Abe, came 16 months later. J.B. probably inherited his pioneering spirit from his father, a jeweller, who, in 1898 left his family in Winnipeg to climb through the White Pass before the railroad was built to seek his fortune in the gold rush at Dawson City.

Elizabeth waited patiently for him for almost five years, but eventually she couldn't wait any longer.

In a 1963 CBC radio interview, J.B. Barron recalled that journey, in which he travelled with his mother and brother by train from Winnipeg to Regina to Calgary to Seattle, where they boarded a liner that sailed north to Skagway on the coast of Alaska. They then took the railroad to Whitehorse, where they boarded the Casca sternwheeler to finally reach Dawson City.

J.B. and Abe stayed long enough to be the first graduates of Dawson City High School, and then they headed to the prestigious University of Chicago law school in 1905. Their devoted mother came with them to the Windy City, helping to support her sons by sewing dresses for vaudeville and Yiddish theatre actresses, and by cooking for them.

Immediately after their graduation in 1911, J.B. Barron came to booming Calgary. Elizabeth and Abe arrived a year later.

In 1914, J. B. Barron married Winnipegger Amelia Helman. The couple had three sons: William (1915-1991), Robert (b. 1916) and Richard (b. 1921).

In 1915, J.B. Barron became the second Jewish lawyer to be admitted to the bar in Calgary. His brother, Abe, passed the bar in 1919 and together they started the law firm Barron & Barron, which has remained in the family ever since and is known today as Ridout Barron.

Despite his sons' early successes and his own constant setbacks (his business burned down three times in Dawson City), Joseph Barron resisted leaving his beloved Klondike.

So the courageous Elizabeth had to once again take another arduous journey in order to coax her husband to return home to be with his family. The parents eventually joined their sons in Calgary in 1913. But Joseph's days were numbered. He passed away in 1915. Elizabeth survived him until 1941.

In those early booming Calgary days, J.B Barron remembers the movies being a "principal amusement." But he also saw them as an opportunity.

After acting as a solicitor for the Allen brothers, a Jewish family that had established a national movie theatre chain, he acquired the Allen's Palace Theatre in 1923.

It was at this time he discovered that, "I seemed to have a flair for the theatre business and that I enjoyed it."

He certainly did. Barron was a powerful force in bringing culture to Calgary. He brought renowned violinist Jascha Heifetz in 1924 and master pianist Sergei Rachmaninoff in 1925 to play to thrilled audiences.

But those heady days weren't to last. J.B. Barron lost the Palace Theatre in 1928 and had to return to practising law.

It took him another nine years before he would acquire another theatre, the Grand, located in the Lougheed Building, which he bought from the Depression-beaten Lougheed family for $50,000. Built in the Beaux-Arts style, the Grand became home to the Calgary Symphony Orchestra and the Calgary Philharmonic.

Robert Barron, in a 2003 interview, described his father as, "Very well known as a theatre manager and operator and owner. He would have known every prominent person in Canada in connection with management of the theatres."

J.B. Barron was truly a renaissance man.

Yet despite being a lawyer, a self-taught photographer, a theatre owner and operator, and an inventor with five patents to his name, he decided to take on his biggest challenge.

And his timing was perfect.

When oil started to flow at Leduc, there was virtually no office space in Calgary. Workers employed by American oil companies that were coming to Calgary found themselves working in basements.

Barron saw another opportunity.

John Barron, his oldest grandson (out of 13 grandchildren), who broke ground for the construction of the building in 1949 with his five-year-old's shovel, remembers that his grandfather was thought of as "crazy" at the time.

"Grandfather was told the city is never going to move that far west," since most of Calgary was centred further east around City Hall.

How short was the naysayers' vision.

Located at 610 8th Avenue S.W., the city has grown for miles beyond the Mobil Oil Building, as it was originally known in honour of its largest tenant.

Richard "Dick" Barron remembers Picassos hanging in the plush Mobil Oil offices. The cluster of office buildings that sprung up around the Mobil Oil Building became known as "the oilpatch" and Calgary became the oil capital of Canada.

These days, most of the neighbouring glass boxes dwarf Calgary's first high-rise office tower, concealing its critical contribution to the city and its cosmopolitan vision.

Modelling his tower after the Lougheed Building and the Grand Theatre complex, J.B. Barron created a mixed-use building, with the Uptown theatres on the first two floors, office space on the second to 10th floors, space for his family business, and a penthouse for himself on the 11th floor.

The penthouse must have been the pinnacle of cool in its day, with its rooftop garden for Barron's dog, Butch. The Uptown theatres, too, were a centre for art and culture, showing movies and live theatre.

Completed in 1951 at a cost of $1.25 million, the Barron Building has been designated as "Significant Alberta Architecture" by the Alberta Association of Architects (ASA). And the rooftop garden won the Vincent Massey Award for excellence in urban planning for a rooftop garden.

The ASA describes the building's exterior as being made of "yellow brick, Tyndall limestone and ornamental aluminum featuring angled chevron and scalloped Art Deco motifs… The penthouse design was influenced by Frank Lloyd Wright.

On the day he died, Sept. 27, 1965, of a stroke, Barron was planning a theatre and shopping centre complex.

In 1981, at the height of the last oil boom, with perfect Barron timing, his sons sold the building to a Swiss family for what is believed to be $6 million. The real estate market collapsed shortly thereafter and the mortgage on the building was eventually foreclosed.

It stood on the market until 1992, when a young banker named Blake O'Brien found himself the accidental owner of the Barron Building after placing a joke bid of $250,000 on it at an auction.

O'Brien has kept the Uptown theatre active, and it's only one of three venues in the city that show art-house and foreign movies. He lives in the penthouse with his own dog.

As other Calgarians obsessively renovate, O'Brien has spared the penthouse from the indignities of homogeneous home improvements. The kitchen has original 1950s rounded-edged cabinets and appliances; the fireplace is made of black slate; the walls are covered with brown panels, and multi-coloured crushed marble floors glow in all their retro-chic glory in the eating area. O'Brien adds to the ambience with his own retro 1950s and 60s furniture.

Despite being the only Art Deco building in Calgary, it has stood nearly empty for most of the last decade and has not escaped the danger of being demolished, especially now that it's once again up for sale.

Joshua Barron, J.B.'s youngest grandson, who bears an uncanny resemblance to his grandfather, says he is grateful to O'Brien.

"If it wasn't for him, the building wouldn't be there. It would have been torn down and there would have been a parking lot or a glass box. Calgary would be poorer."

J.B. Barron endured the risks of being the first to build a high-rise tower in Calgary, but the challenge for future owners is simpler – restore it, and they will come.

Reframing the debate

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The Jerusalem Summit is an Israel-based advocacy group that brings together evangelicals, neo-conservatives and supporters of Israel from around the world. Its objective is to reframe the debate over the status of the Palestinian territories, radical Islam, and what's been viewed as the "moral relativism" of the West.

To its detractors, the summit is regarded as a strident right wing anomaly that was created to influence U.S. foreign policy and incite a "clash of civilizations" with the Arab-Islamic world.

There are others who disagree with its strong ties to evangelical Christians, who have nonetheless been described by the summit's academic director, Martin Sherman, as "the only group with the spiritual energy, numerical mass and moral resolve to confront Islamic extremism."

But like it or not, this new entity has given a long overdue shot in the arm to those who are becoming increasingly disenchanted with the often passive, placatory and defeatist attitudes of an array of organizations that are supposed to be more vigorously defending the interests of Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

It could also be seen to be addressing what novelist Martin Amis has referred to as "people of liberal sympathies, stupefied by relativism, [who] have become the apologists for a creedal wave that is racist, misogynist, homophobic, imperialist and genocidal."

Is it not about time that we stopped trying to explain, for example, why Israel is not an apartheid state and instead began to identify where apartheid – much as the term is misused – might really be flourishing?

One of the summit's strategies is to expose what it describes as the "gender and creed apartheid" (i.e. the subjugation of women and the persecution of religious minorities) that is so much a part of radical Islamic ideology. By reversing the paradigm and focusing on the tyrannies of the very regimes that demonize not only Jews and Israel, but all those who do not adhere to strict Islamist doctrine, it hopes to bring to much wider public awareness the imminent dangers of Muslim radicalism.

Israel has had to put up with far more than the apartheid slur. Its enemies have persistently tried to taint it with just about every canard in the political lexicon. More often than not, such allegations have gained far more traction than they deserve, thus fuelling the various academic boycotts, divestment campaigns and biased resolutions from international agencies that have sought to undermine the state's very legitimacy.

No one is suggesting that the philosophy and modus operandi of the Jerusalem Summit are sacrosanct. However, by ignoring political correctness and aggressively drawing attention to the hypocrisy and real motives of those who would wish to see Israel destroyed, it provides Israel advocates with a proactive framework that ought to be more widely endorsed.

Iran seeks to avert pre-emptive Israeli attack

Leslie Susser in Jerusalem

As it inches toward nuclear weapons capability, Iran is taking steps designed primarily to deter a pre-emptive strike by Israel or the United States. The main focus, analysts in Israel say, is to keep Syria in the Iranian orbit and to prevent Saudi Arabia from playing an active role in the latest American-sponsored Middle East peacemaking initiative.

The Iranian strategy is two-pronged:

- to undermine the U.S. peace initiative, thereby perpetuating Middle Eastern chaos in Iraq and significantly reducing America's political will for a showdown with Iran;
- to beef up the Iranian-Syrian-Hezbollah-Hamas missile threat against Israel. With the prospect of simultaneous missile attacks on all parts of the country from Syria, Lebanon, Gaza and Iran itself, Israel would think long and hard, according to this plan, before even contemplating a pre-emptive strike against Iran's nuclear facilities.

An active Saudi peacemaking role in the region or an Israeli-Syrian peace deal could upset Iran's plans. This was the context of recent strong Iranian messages to Riyadh and of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's July 19 visit to Damascus, just two days after Syria's newly re-elected President Bashar Assad spoke about possible peace moves with Israel.

The day after Ahmadinejad visited Damascus, a report in the London-based Saudi newspaper Asharq al-Awsat claimed that the Iranian president had promised to foot the bill for $1 billion (US) in advanced weapons for Syria if Damascus promised not to pursue peace talks with Israel.

Iran immediately denied the report, and Israeli intelligence officials said they strongly doubted the total accuracy of its details. The report had claimed that the money would be for advanced Russian tanks, fighter planes and helicopters; that Iran would help Syria build a factory for medium-range rockets; and that it would provide assistance in nuclear research and the development of chemical weapons.

Still, Israeli officials argue that even if the details were not accurate, Iran has been investing heavily for some time in a significant Syrian arms build-up and in Syria's economic infrastructure with a view toward keeping Damascus in its sphere of influence. Indeed, ever since early 2005, Iranian investments in Syria have been freeing up Syrian capital for the purchase of Russian arms, including sophisticated air defence systems and anti-tank weapons.

Assad, keenly aware of how much Iran needs his support and how much the West would like to have Syria on the other side of the strategic equation, is playing a double game: keeping close to Tehran while intimating that under certain conditions, he might be prepared to switch sides. He is trying to raise the price Iran or the West would have to pay for Syria's allegiance.

In his re-election speech to parliament in mid-July, Assad laid down tough conditions for peace talks with Israel: first, Israel would have to provide a commitment in writing to hand over the strategic Golan Heights should negotiations succeed; second, he rejected Israel's call for direct, secret talks, saying Syria would only be ready for public talks through the good offices of a third party.

At the same time, he revealed that progress had been made in secret negotiations through a third party.

So far, the United States has not been prepared to become involved in Israeli-Syrian peacemaking. This vacuum apparently has been filled by Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul, who has been mediating between the parties for months.

Despite Assad's double game, Iran, at least for now, seems to have the Damascus-Jerusalem peace track well blocked.

The Iranians also seem to have had success in deterring Saudi Arabia from playing a leading role in pushing the 2002 Saudi peace initiative, which has since become the Arab League peace plan. The lead in carrying the Arab peace plan, therefore, has been taken by Egypt and Jordan – two countries that already have peace with Israel. Israeli and U.S. officials are deeply disappointed that the Saudis have failed to join them, believing that open Saudi contacts with Israel could have served as a powerful signal for other moderate states.

How to get the Saudis to be more proactive will be a major American policy challenge in the run-up to the regional peace conference recently announced by U.S. President George W. Bush. Otherwise, Israel and the United States may find themselves outmanoeuvred by Iran on the Syrian, the moderate Arab and the Palestinian tracks.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In response to my CJN column on "How the Diaspora can help fix Israel" (Feb. 8, 2007), which included a brief comment on the New Israel Fund, Isser Dubinsky, president of NIF Canada's board of directors, and Jay Brodbar, NIF Canada's executive director, wrote a long letter singing the praises of their organization and rejecting the image of "an aging-hippie projection of American Jews involvement in the Civil Rights era." One month later, the Harvard Crimson carried a news story headlined "New Israel Fund lawyers compare Bedouins' plight to U.S. civil rights movement." If the shoe fits…

In its almost 30-year history, the NIF has become one of the most wealthy and powerful Jewish institutions in Israel and the Diaspora – in that sense, it's a huge success. But like other power brokers, NIF officials systematically reject constructive criticism. As a result, mistakes are compounded until the organization reaches a crisis.

As mail from NIF donors to me and NGO Monitor (of which I'm executive director) demonstrates, an increasing number of people are asking questions about how their money is being used.

But with at least 150 groups receiving grants at any time, it's difficult for anyone to get a general picture of the NIF, or to understand how its decisions are made.

Some of these grants and projects are strictly charitable, such as assistance provided to communities in northern Israel to overcome the impact of last year's war.

However, much of the NIF's budget goes to highly political activities designed to change Israeli society according to a particular design.

Some Israeli board members who are central in selecting the NGOs and projects are fringe politicians and activists who use the money to impose their agendas after being rejected at the ballot box. As a result, in this sense, many Israelis have an image of the NIF that is anti-democratic, arrogant and dangerous – as a body that comes from the outside and mysteriously gives large sums of money to a few activists.

Unlike government programs that are subject to public debate and accountability, most Israelis have no recourse when the NIF promotes an agenda to which they strongly object. And most NIF donors are shielded from this perception.

The largest chunk – one-third – of the NIF's annual budget goes to more than 20 organizations that claim to promote "civil rights" for Israel's Arab minority.

But these NGOs use the money to demonize and delegitimize the concept of Jewish sovereignty and equality among the nations. Some, such as Adalah and Mousawa, submit papers to the United Nations accusing Israel of apartheid. They also refer to Zionism as racism, and distribute an alternative constitution for Israel that would abolish the concept of a Jewish state.

The NIF is responsible for "empowering" the most radical Israeli Arab voices and giving them the resources to dominate the discussion at the expense of moderate leaders.

Misguided NIF policies also support radical groups such as Physicians for Human Rights-Israel, and the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions, whose head, Jeff Halper, supports the most virulent boycott promoters, such as Naim Ateek.

And after funding Tel Aviv lawyer Shamai Leibowitz – who supports economic sanctions against Israel and the creation of a binational state west of the Jordan River – NIF officials quietly admitted that they don't endorse his views, but they didn't apologize for this error, and the damage was done.

For these and other reasons, the time for an open debate on the NIF is long overdue. NIF donors should be able to listen to different Israeli views and decide how best to use their considerable funds.

The NIF is an important institution that should help cement the relationship between Israelis and Diaspora Jews. With realistic goals and by encouraging valid criticism and open debate, the NIF can play a constructive role. In this spirit of co-operation, I urge Dubinsky and Brodbar to forgo the standard letters to the editor and join me and other Israelis in public discussions on how best to realize our shared goals.

The Kirshner File

U.S. involvement in Mideast goes back a long way

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The United States has replaced Britain and France as the pre-eminent foreign power in the Middle East, yet most Americans have no idea that their country's role in the region is steeped in history. They generally assume that U.S. interest in the Mideast is a function of the Cold War, the Arab-Israeli dispute and Washington's partial dependence on Arab oil. But the truth of the matter is that American involvement in Middle Eastern affairs predates U.S. tensions with the Soviet Union, the birth of Israel and the discovery of oil deposits in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states.

Indeed, you may be surprised to learn that the United States' first military engagement in the Mideast – the Barbary wars, fought off the coast of North Africa before and during the 1800s – galvanized America's sense of identity and led to the creation of the U.S. Navy.

This is the story that Israeli-American historian Michael Oren tells in Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present (W.W. Norton), a work of sweeping erudition and range.

Oren, whose last book was Six Days of War, the definitive account of the Six Day War, acknowledges that there is no shortage of books about this important topic. As examples, he cites George Lenczowski's American Presidents and the Middle East and Robert Kaplan's The Arabists.

But in his estimation, no one before him has examined this subject in all its military, economic and cultural dimensions. Nor, he claims with less veracity, has there been an academic account that is accessible to both scholars and general readers. "This book strives to fill that vacuum," he writes.

Oren explores three motifs that have been integral to America's presence in the Middle East: power, faith and fantasy.

Power is related to Washington's pursuit of its interests. Two examples will suffice: President James Madison's decision to use gunboat diplomacy against Algiers in 1815 and President Abraham Lincoln's attempts, in 1863, to dissuade Egypt from meddling in Mexico.

By faith, Oren refers to the impact religion has had on the shaping of policy. Christian missionaries, the first of whom departed in 1819 with the goal of restoring Palestine to Jewish sovereignty, were certainly influential. But Jewish lobbyists, particularly after 1948, were similarly effective in setting the agenda.

With respect to fantasy, Oren has in mind the romantic montage of images – minarets, pyramids, oases, camels and sand dunes – that originated in the Bible and countless books and Hollywood movies. These notions influenced public perceptions of the Middle East and prompted President James Polk to sponsor a naval expedition to the Jordan River and the Dead Sea in 1847.

According to Oren, the United States faced its first serious external threat from the Middle East when Barbary, or Arab, pirates hijacked three American vessels on the high seas and imprisoned their passengers in 1785. An emissary, John Lamb, was dispatched to Algeria to secure the release of the ships and the hostages. Lamb failed and America's first diplomatic initiative in the Mideast fizzled.

The problem persisted as yet more ships were seized. In response, President George Washington implored Congress to build a navy. In 1794, Congress passed a bill authorizing an outlay of $688,000 to construct six frigates to protect U.S. commerce in Arab waters.

Within seven years, the ships were put to use when an American armada sailed to Libya to deal with a local ruler whose troops had defiled the American consulate in Tripoli.

Subsequently, a U.S. naval task force under the command of Stephen Decatur was dispatched to North Africa to crush the Barbary pirates once and for all. Decatur succeeded, and the menace was permanently removed.

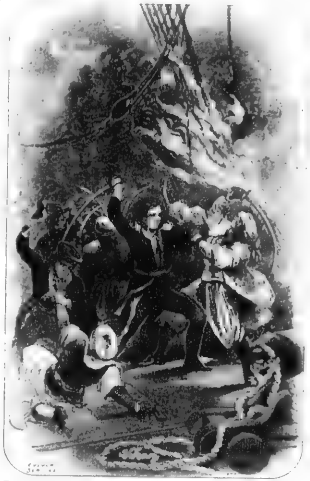
During this period, Islam was poorly regarded in the United States, having been denounced as a false and degenerate religion by prominent colonial theologians, and the Mideast was perceived as both a romantic and threatening realm thanks to memoirs written by European diplomats and travellers.

As Oren points out, the concept of restorationism – the repatriation of Jews to their ancestral homeland in Palestine to hasten the messianic day of redemption – gained currency in the United States around the mid-19th century.

As a result, many American Protestants were fascinated by Jews, some wishing to convert them to Christianity and still others hoping to restore them to Palestine.

In line with the belief that the Second Coming could be kick-started by the immigration of Jews to Palestine, the restorationist George Adams and his disciples set sail for Jaffa in 1867. The settlement they founded floundered in a miasma of sickness and disorganization.

According to Oren, the missionary movement, which blossomed into "a national passion" in the four decades prior to the Civil War, was instrumental in establishing the first modern universities in the Arab world and Turkey and the nation's first chair in Arabic at Yale University.



In this early 19th century print, Stephen Decatur leads his men against Barbary pirates.

As the 19th century wore on, novelists continued to expose Americans to the allures of the Middle East. As well as writing The Legend of Sleepy Hollow and creating a character named Rip Van Winkle, Washington Irving produced Alhambra, an anthology of scintillating Arabian tales that, Oren observes, perpetuated "the myths that Americans continued to harbour about the Middle East."

Herman Melville, the author of Moby Dick, deftly deflated such notions after visiting Palestine and describing it as desolate. The satirist Mark Twain travelled to Palestine as well. He, too, was not impressed, dismissing it "a hopeless, dreary, heart-broken land."

In general, American tourists with the means to visit the Holy Land were also disappointed, finding not the idealized settings of the Bible but rather the ruins and poverty of a neglected backwater. And yet, as Oren notes, books about the Middle East proved to be exceptionally popular with Americans.

Strangely, the United States evinced little interest in Egyptian affairs, probably because Egypt was not a focal point of American missionary activity, and thus passed up an opportunity to participate in the digging of the Suez Canal.

Yet the United States was not loath to project its military power far beyond the Suez Canal. In 1879, the USS Ticonderoga became the first American warship to pass through the Strait of Hormuz and penetrate the Persian Gulf, which had previously been an exclusively British lake.

Nonetheless, at the dawn of the 20th century, the Mideast seemed irrelevant to American decision-makers, while the Far East and South America loomed large. American shortsightedness was such that Congress refused to allocate funds for the building of a U.S. embassy in Istanbul.

On the eve of World War I, the United States, a major oil producer, realized that its domestic fields could no longer sate the appetite of industry, car owners and the armed forces. And so the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey started prospecting in Mesopotamia – modern-day Iraq – while Standard Oil of New York acquired rights to drill in Syria, Palestine and parts of Asia Minor.

The hunt for black gold would become a raison d'etre of American policy in the Mideast. But until the outbreak of the great war in 1914, Washington's primary interest in the area turned on buttressing trade and nurturing missionaries.

Next week: America raises its profile in the Middle East.

Sara Pachter was a passionate advocate for Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Sara Pachter, a tour leader who led thousands of tourists to Israel, is remembered for being a passionate advocate for the Jewish state.

Pachter, 93, who died on July 9 of congestive heart failure, led her 100th tour in 1991, and continued to work until two years ago at Fisher- Fremont Travel Ltd. on Eglinton Avenue West – she started working for owner and president Shelley Fremont's father, Butch, in 1964.

Fremont said she was 12 when her mother died "and Sara was the mother I lost. She was an extraordinary woman and was never too busy to talk."

She said she can't even estimate how many more times Pachter travelled to Israel after that 100th tour.

"She led tours and she went on her own. She went for the first time in 1959, and it took 37 hours to get there. It was her place. She loved Israel, and she wanted other people to share in her love," Fremont said.

"She made the mould when it came to travelling [there]. Other people tried to live up to what she did, but she was the best. She left very big footsteps," she added.

"She was devastated when tourism dropped [during the intifadahs], and took it personally when people cancelled their trips. She always told them that 'If I'm going, it's safe to go.'"

Fremont said that until Pachter stopped working, she remained "feisty and sharp. She kept everything in her head and never used a calculator.

"She loved fulfilling people's fantasies about their special trip to Israel, and when she went with them, she was tireless. People had to keep up with her.

"She would take all-night flights home and come right into the office to begin organizing another tour. She was overflowing with enthusiasm and energy."

Pachter's daughter Karen Ross said in her eulogy that her mother set the bar for working hard, making time for friends and providing a loving home for family gatherings.

Sara Pachter

"She lived an accomplished, amazing full life. What a privilege to have had her as a role model."

Ross said that as her mother's strength diminished in the last few months, "her frustration, anger and will to survive increased. This was my mother – stubborn, determined and a fighter to the very end."

Jennifer Ross, Pachter's granddaughter, said her grandmother was an inspiration to all her grandchildren.

"She was always positive, and you never heard her complaining. She lived the life she wanted to live, she enjoyed it all, she loved her work, and she never let her age hold her back. She showed us that age is just a number. What really matters is how you feel about yourself."

In a telephone interview, Pachter's son Charles, a well-known Toronto artist, called his mother a legend.

"She didn't know what feminism was, but she was a wife, a mother to four kids and she had a full-time career."

His mother knew how to make an event special, he said.

"She would be at a bat mitzvah celebration at Masada at dawn, and she would bring out sparklers. She would add something sensational to an already sensational event."

He said that after his father died in 1998, he travelled with his mother and his brother David to Vienna, Prague and Budapest. "We could not keep up with her. She was adventurous, incredibly energetic and full of curiosity."

Pachter, a longtime member of Holy Blossom Temple, was the wife of the late Harry, and mother and mother-in-law of Maida and Rick Williams, Charles, Karen Ross, and David. She also leaves her grandchildren Michael and Raina Williams, Jennifer and Adam Irwin, Adam and Katherine Ross, and great-grandchildren Ryan, Jesse and Harrison.

Arts patron remembered for her charm and resolve

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Bluma Appel used charm, determination and originality to make the world a better place.

The Montreal-born philanthropist and arts patron died of lung cancer July 15 at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital. She was 86.

At her funeral, Appel's son Mark credited his parents' love after 67 years of marriage as the explanation for her many involvements.

In addition to her arts and charity work, Appel – for whom Toronto's Bluma Appel Theatre was named in 1983 – was a federal candidate for the Liberal party in the Ottawa area in 1979 and served as liaison to Marc Lalonde, the minister responsible for the status of women, from 1975 to 1979. In that role, she campaigned successfully to have women advance onto the boards of large Canadian companies.

Bluma Appel

"There is the spark of good in all of us, and in my mother and with my father that spark was their love for each other, which became something of conflagration. The fire that was created enabled her to fly," he said.

David, the Appels' older son, recalled his mother's "life force and exuberance for life," as well as her ability "to make you feel life was truly an adventure." He remembers his childhood home in Montreal – the city of Bluma's birth – as a place of laughter, noise and dinner table discussions on topics such as philosophy, love and politics.

At a young age, he learned that "there are always others who need your help" when his mother gave him his first allowance – 25 cents – and told him he had to give a nickel to charity.

Appel was known for supporting charitable causes that were not necessarily on the radar screen of other philanthropists – from AIDS in the very early days of the disease, to including struggling comedians among the beneficiaries of her arts support.

Eli Rubenstein, who officiated at Appel's funeral, recalled in his eulogy his first encounter with Appel more than two years ago, a story he felt was indicative of her persistence, charm and generosity. She called him after seeing his name in a newspaper article about the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind, an organization that trains guide dogs for Israelis who are blind.

Appel told him she wanted to help, but when Rubenstein suggested that she meet with the organization's director next time he was in town from Israel, Appel insisted she wanted to help right away and that Rubenstein come to meet with her the following day.

Rubenstein "simply couldn't say no to her," he recalled. Before long, the Appels became the largest donors to the guide dog association, he said.

At their initial meeting, Appel decided she wanted Rubenstein, the spiritual leader of Congregation Habonim, to officiate at her and her husband's funerals, when the time came. To that end, she set up further meetings so that he could learn about the type of people they were, Rubenstein said.

As he got to know Appel better, Rubenstein learned of her "countless" theatre initiatives, many of which were artistic but not commercial successes. Appel's take – in contrast to her husband who suggested she was losing money – was that, on the contrary, she was "spending" money.

Rubenstein said there was not enough time to touch upon the breadth of Appel's philanthropic activities, which included support for the Canadian Opera Company, the National Gallery, the Royal Ontario Museum, CANFAR (the Canadian Foundation for AIDS Research, which she founded in the 1980s), ORT and the University of Toronto. She once told Rubenstein, "We look for orphan causes, the ones that are neglected by others."

Appel became a member of the Order of Canada in 1988 for her community involvement, and the honour was upgraded to officer in 2001.

Among other honours, the Canadian Club of Toronto named her Canadian of the Year earlier this year, and she received the Dora Mavor Moore Award from the Toronto Alliance for the Performing Arts in 2005 for her dedication to the performing arts in Canada, as well as honorary doctorates from two universities. In 1987, she received the National Council of Jewish Women's national community leadership award.

In addition to her husband and two sons, Appel leaves five grandchildren and her sister, Goldie Epstein. She was predeceased by her brothers Hy and Irving Levitt.

Members cite union's anti-Israel initiatives as reason for leaving

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

After promising to decertify from the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) over its demonization of Israel, and CUPE National's lack of support, union members of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, formerly known as CUPE 2063(a), has made good on that promise.

The move towards decertification began in May 2006 following a convention in which the 170,000-strong Ontario division of CUPE passed a motion unanimously calling for a boycott of Israeli goods while describing Israeli policies in the Middle East as "apartheid-like."

Despite a storm of protest – headed up by employees of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region - to have the boycott rescinded, CUPE remained unimpressed.

NO 2 50
MISINFORMATION is not EDUCATION
TRUTH TO 50
TRUTH TO 50

Former members of CUPE 2063(a) hold placards during an informaton picket in front of CUPE's Scarborough headquarters on June 16, 2006.

"After resolution 50 was passed at the convention, we realized that the union no longer represented the needs of our membership and we would have to find a union that did," said Lil Nobel, the former president of CUPE 2063(a). "It took a long time to get to where we are now, and I am proud to say we are no longer part of CUPE."

A five-page letter sent to CUPE's National president, Paul Moist, which was signed by representatives of five Jewish social service agencies representing several hundred workers, was not even acknowledged until six months after receipt said Nobel, and only then after learning of the local's plan to decertify.

On June 16, 2006, in another attempt to be heard, the union staged an information picket – with representatives of other CUPE locals - at CUPE's Scarborough headquarters.

Although the local executive was eventually contacted by the office of the president of CUPE National indicating his willingness to sit down and discuss the matter with Nobel, it was too late.

"The call came just prior to the vote that the union was going to conduct regarding decertification. It was too little too late," said Nobel.

According to Steve Shulman, Ontario director and national general counsel, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, the CUPE resolution was not based on fact. "The resolution read like something that might have been issued 20 years ago instead of today," he said.

"We were absolutely outraged when we heard about this ridiculous, untrue anti-Israel initiative," said Nobel. "In fact, it wasn't only us in the union. The phone was ringing off the hook when the boycott was announced, as people – Jews and non-Jews alike – wanted to voice their dismay. Our members were regularly voicing their shame in being part of CUPE and we immediately began looking at other options."

This boycott wasn't the first time that CUPE Ontario became immersed in Middle East resolutions. In June 2002, at the height of the intifada, a CUPE resolution demanded that "Israel immediately end its current military assaults" and that the Israeli government "immediately withdraw from the occupied territories and abide by UN resolution 242." Beginning this month, UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region are members of the United Employees Association, an association formed by employees of both organizations.

As students begin to gear up for another challenging school year, Toronto's Koffler Centre of the Arts has come up with a fun and educational way to bid farewell to the joys of summer vacation.

The first annual Summer Arts Party, created for children aged 6 to 16, will be offering participants an exciting and eclectic array of activities. Known for its innovative arts programming, the Koffler Centre has designed the week especially for children who are curious about music, dance, painting, drawing, and pottery to experiment and let their creativity loose.

Arts "Partyers" will explore many art forms - from clay sculpture, to painting indoors and out, to creating their own dance moves - all with the help of professional artists.

Sculpting with clay is one of the many art forms children can explore during the Koffler Centre of the Arts' Summer Arts Party.

"The Summer Arts Party is a way for the Koffler Centre to introduce young people to the amazing variety of the arts from many cultures," says Lorri Starr, executive director of the Koffler Centre of the Arts. "It is for kids who love music, dance, and visual art, or think they might want a chance to spend that last week before school doing something totally liberating, fun, engaging, and varied - hopefully with their friends."

Among the artists featured is a master drummer from Ghana, Kwasi Dunyo, who will both perform and teach participants how to play. Television and film recording artist, Alan Hetherington, will lead a Brazilian Carnivale jam session on a wide range of percussive and string instruments. Two evening programs for the teens round out the week. The Big Draw, on Tuesday, August 28 is an evening of drawing-based games and contests with MC Misha Glouberman, who regularly spins tunes at the Drake Hotel. He is making his "uptown" Koffler debut. Thursday, August 30 is the evening Battle of the Dancers where the dance group, Sole Power, will lead a groove to the latest hip hop, break dance steps and more.

"This is a first for the Koffler Centre and shows our commitment to multi-disciplinary arts education, and the joy of being creative," says Starr.

The first annual Summer Arts Party will be held from Monday, August 27 to Friday, August 31, from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. daily.

Visit www.kofflerarts.org to view the schedule of each day's activities which includes a mid-morning swim. The cost is $350 all inclusive for the week. A limited number of scholarships are available. To register or to receive further information, call Elyse Goody at 416-636-1880 ext. 222.

Fostering diversity through inclusive public education

By IGOR ELLYN

In the debate about integrating faith-based schools that meet provincial standards into the public system, critics have suggested that inclusive public education will "segregate children" by faith.

Nothing could be further from the truth.

In fact, integrating faith-based schools in public education will bring children of all faiths closer together. Think about the possibilities of intramural sports, science fairs, classroom exchanges and cultural events – just a few examples of kids from different public classrooms coming together to share their heritage. Equally important are the opportunities for teachers from diverse communities meeting and learning from one another through professional development.

Isn't this what the public system is all about?

The public system already includes 600,000 Catholic school children who are fully integrated. Publicly funded Catholic school students interact with those of other faiths in many areas of life and thousands of Catholic graduates are making significant contributions to Ontario and Canada in every possible field.

Similarly, faith-based schools that would qualify for integration into the public system, including Jewish day schools, teach students the importance of diversity, offer them opportunities to learn about and interact with other communities, and encourage them to become positive contributors to society. The ranks of day school graduates are filled with medical researchers, lawyers who assist the vulnerable, volunteers for the disadvantaged and overseas aid workers. Under a policy of inclusive public education, interfaith understanding and cooperation would likely become an even larger component of school life.

The reality is that 53,000 non-Catholic faith-based students are currently disenfranchised from public education. The status quo is inequitable and out of touch with Ontario's 21st century diversity.

We encourage all political parties to carefully consider the value of inclusive public education, and develop their own plan to integrate faith-based schools that meet provincial standards into the public system.

Igor Ellyn is Education Chair, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region.

Toronto teen spearheads Ethiopian shoe drive

Over 1,200 children benefit from Jacob Shiff's vision

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG

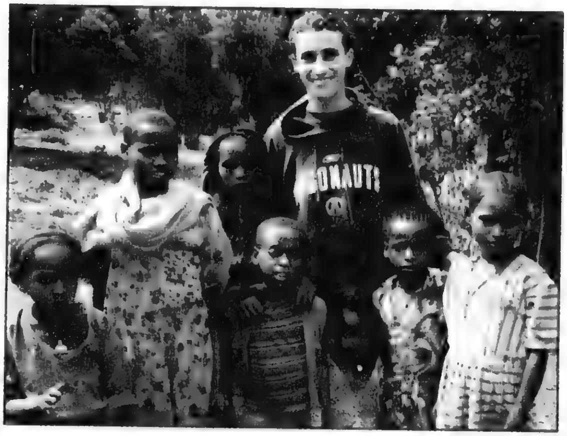
When Jacob Shiff heard his father describe the poverty he saw during a UJA Federation mission to Ethiopia, he wanted to see what it would feel like with the shoe on the other foot – literally.

With the help of his school, TanenbaumCHAT, Shiff ran a "shoe drive for Ethiopia," and, as a result of his efforts, 1,200 more Ethiopians now have protection during the rainy season.

"It just made so much sense," says Shiff, explaining how the project came about. "On the one hand, our closets were overflowing with old shoes that we wanted to get rid of. On the other hand, you have a country full of people who are so desperate for shoes that they tie rubber tires around their feet."

Shiff was inspired by a request his father and sister encountered while on their Ethiopian mission.

"Dr. Rick Hodes, the medical director in Ethiopia for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), who also acts, voluntarily, as the doctor in charge of the Mother Theresa Mission in Addis Ababa, a palliative care clinic, asked us to leave behind extra shoes to be distributed to needy people," says Shiff's father, Randy. "I told Jacob the story and he saw the opportunity."



Jacob Shiff poses with some of the Ethiopian children who were the beneficiaries of a shoe drive organized by the Toronto teen.

With posters proclaiming "many of Ethiopia's children have no shoes," Shiff appealed to his classmates and teachers to help them. Overwhelmed by the positive response from TanenbaumCHAT, Shiff was able to accommodate only two of the other Toronto schools that wanted to participate, Netivot HaTorah Day School (which he had attended) and United Synagogue Day School. In all, over 1,200 pairs of shoes were donated.

But if collecting the shoes was relatively easy, getting them to Ethiopia was a logistical headache, requiring the international cooperation of Canada Israel Experience, El Al, Taglit-birthright israel, UJA Federation, the JDC, United Jewish Communities, and the Jewish Agency for Israel, Israel's overseas agency.

Shiff, however, never gave up ownership of his project. Accompanied by his father, he flew in July to Addis Ababa where, along with Hodes, he oversaw the distribution of the shoes through the Missionaries of Charity, a Mother Theresa organization.

"It's a whole other world," says Shiff of Ethiopia. "Even in the cities – it's not as though there's garbage collection twice a week. The floor is full of broken glass and garbage; it's flooded with diseases. Just walking through, seeing where these people are coming from, and on the flip side, seeing how happy they were to get the shoes, made me understand even more how much we could do with a little work."

Hoop dreams alive and well in Kiryat Moshe

By SHARON SCHWARTZMAN

Like many of his Canadian peers, Toronto native David Goodman's birthright israel trip included a visit to Kiryat Moshe, a Rehovot neighbourhood with many Ethiopian immigrants where UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has provided significant assistance. His group participated in a new building project to develop a clubroom next to the existing community centre.

But Goodman had a greater vision. Upon returning to Toronto, he decided to take his commitment to the neighbourhood a step further and, after speaking to representatives from Kiryat Moshe, Goodman decided to sponsor a basketball court. To raise the funds, he organized a basketball tournament in Toronto called Hoops For Israel. Goodman recently witnessed the fruits of his labour firsthand when he participated in the new court's dedication ceremony and opening game.

Toronto's David Goodman (front, right) enjoys the new basketball court in Kiryat Moshe, which he made possible.

"It is incredibly emotional to see what one kid with a dream, and a community that is committed to helping people reach their dreams, can achieve," said Lorne Klemensberg, director of Canada Israel Experience (CIE) Israel, affiliated with UJA Federation and Canada's largest organizer of birthright israel trips. "I am so unbelievably proud of David and the others who helped make today a reality."

Guests at the ceremony, which began after the birthright participants worked on the clubroom renovations, included Rehovot mayor Shuki Forer; Yossi Tanuri, director-general of UIA Federations Canada, the umbrella organization for Canadian Jewish Federations; UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chair, David Engel; and UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky.

"From the moment he returned to Toronto, David Goodman worked tirelessly to make this vision a reality," said Engel. "David's commitment is an example to both our communities."

"It is such a pleasure to be here today and witness, firsthand, the joy on these kids faces all made possible by a committed and passionate former birthright israel participant," said Sokolsky. "David Goodman is the personification of what birthright is all about; connecting our future leaders to Israel and having them continue that connection with, and love for, Israel long after their trip has come to an end."

Following their remarks, a group of local Ethiopian youth performed an original rap, celebrating the partnership between Kiryat Moshe and Toronto. But most appropriately, the festivities ended with a basketball tournament,and thanks to David Goodman, every team that participated was a winner.

Remembering Israel's Captive Soldiers

Nearly 300 people recently gathered outside the Israeli Consulate in Toronto on behalf of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah on July 12, 2006 and Gilad Shalit, taken captive by Hamas on June 25 last year.

The vigil was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), International Christian Embassy Jerusalem and Mothers for MIAs.

"Gilad, Eldad and Ehud were not the victims of a battle; they were the victims of kidnapping," said Koschitzky. "Their terrorist captors should be considered criminals."

"Canada's Jewish community stands united in demanding the safe return of Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev," said Dimant. "We speak with one voice reminding all governments of their commitment to oppose terrorism, whenever and wherever it may occur."

Members vote to reorient Holy Blossom sanctuary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The membership at Holy Blossom Temple has voted in favour of a resolution to make renovations to its 69-year-old Bathurst Street building that will include a controversial reorientation of the 1,100-seat sanctuary.

Of 2,458 voters who cast their ballots by the July 16 deadline, 2,458 were in favour of renovating, and of those, 1,505 were in favour of reorienting the sanctuary so that it would face east as in more traditional synagogues, while 953 were opposed to that option. A reorientation of the sanctuary would mean that worshippers would no longer face the temple's domed apse, but instead its stained-glass rose window at what is now the rear of the sanctuary.

Critics said such a change would not be in keeping with the congregation's history and the building's architectural integrity, while supporters said it would make the building more user-friendly, and in the process show support for Israel and bring the congregation in line with other shuls whose sanctuaries face Jerusalem.

With more than 61 per cent in favour of reorienting the sanctuary, "I think that's a clear mandate that we go forward to the next step of the project," said Benjamin Applebaum, the synagogue's executive director. He noted, as well, that the sanctuary represents only one aspect of the project.

Other aspects in the plan developed by Diamond & Schmitt architects include a three-story central atrium that would serve as a gathering space and entry to other parts of the building; a new social hall with offices above it; and an underground parking lot with an elevator to the atrium.

In a July 24 letter to congregants, Holy Blossom president Barry Silver wrote, "I think we all recognize that in getting to this stage, there has been a long, passionate debate with strong opinions voiced on both sides. We sincerely hope that the next few months will be a time of healing and that we can all come together and work for the best future of Holy Blossom Temple."

He invited members to become involved in taking the plans from the conceptual stage to a more detailed design phase. There are many decisions to make over the next several months, he wrote.

Applebaum said the temple is "probably two years away" from breaking ground. However, the project is contingent on an upcoming congregational vote to approve a comprehensive financial plan that will be developed in the coming year.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The Jewish art of compromise

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

The late great leader and scholar Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik wrote a brilliant essay titled "The Torah Way of Justice." In it, he maintains that the system of law in Judaism possesses a higher form of justice than any other legal system. This critical concept is called pesharah, compromise.

Maimonides, in his great corpus of Jewish law, the Mishneh Torah, writes that a Jewish judge must always ask the litigants: "Do you prefer din [a decision according to the law] or pesharah ?" If the litigants choose pesharah, the judge must abide by their decision, according to Maimonides. Then he concludes with these words: "Ve-kol bet din she'osin pesharah tamid harei zeh meshubach." "And a court that always settles cases through compromise is most praiseworthy."

Rabbi Soloveitchik points out that in actual practice, in traditional Jewish courts, the rabbi, acting as judge, settled almost 95 per cent of all cases by pesharah rather than by the requirements of the law, the din. As a matter of fact, a dayan, a judge, who settled cases by strict application of the law was considered derelict in his duties.

Why is pesharah superior to din? In the case of din, one party emerges victorious while the other is vanquished. Even though a trial has ended and a verdict has been given, discord, anger and resentment linger on. While the legal issue may have been settled, the human bitterness may continue to fester.

When there is pesharah, on the other hand, the goal is not to be juridically precise and correct. Instead, the objective is to achieve social healing. The Torah wants the judge to act not only as a magistrate but also as a teacher and healer. For the Jewish tradition, true justice in the highest sense exists only when there is reconciliation between the parties.

In truth, pesharah is a concept that applies beyond the walls and chambers of the courtroom. Consider how we could improve our relationships if we learned the art of the compromise.

If this art was practised by employers and employees, we could drastically diminish the number of strikes, lockouts and work actions. We could also relieve the attendant suffering. Instead, compromise would prevail among the parties.

Imagine how much anguish and hurt feelings between parents and children could be relieved if both sides were willing to compromise.

In conflicts between husbands and wives, each person has to give a little, to be able to admit, "I am not always right, and you are not always right, so let's try to work things out," in order for there to be shalom bayit, peace in our homes.

I am certain we have all heard the joke concerning the two claimants and their meeting with the rabbi, in which he tells the first man, "You are right" after he presents his case and he tells the second man, "You are also right." This humour reflects an essential aspect of the art of compromise: a person must see the merit of the arguments or positions on the other side. Even though a person may believe they are, so to speak, more in the right, this does not automatically translate into the opposing side being totally in the wrong.

We are now reading the book of Deuteronomy in the Torah. It speaks of the importance of justice, for example, "Tzedek, tzedek tirdof" – "Justice, justice, shall you pursue." Do we want real justice in our lives? Instead of gloating over victories or suffering over defeats, we should remember the lesson of "You are right" and learn and practise pesharah, the art of compromise.

A toxic refusal to communicate

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

It is hardly surprising to assert that we live in an era of profound religious globalization. Perhaps as a result of the significant impact of the communications revolution in modern life, creeds of every kind have spread out to all corners of the globe.

Jews and Judaism have experienced this in a dual way. To cite one item, the ubiquitous presence of Chabad ensures a Jewish reach virtually everywhere. On the other hand, the interaction is reciprocal, resulting, for instance, in scores of Jews becoming full-fledged Buddhists in both ideology and practice. To give yet another example, the majority of Dutch children entering grade school in Rotterdam are Muslim.

The inevitable result of this trend is the phenomenon of religious pluralism, the co-existence of various faiths in relative harmony. But as Prof. Peter Berger recently argued, this is actually a rather limited concept if it omits the possibility of interaction between the different groups.

One can have multiple religious communities all in the same geographical domain, but if each retreats to its own corner with no sign of a relationship, that is a fairly denuded version of what could emerge in such circumstances. As Berger states, it's the social interaction between the groups that's key, "because as people talk to each other, as they converse with each other, they influence each other, and that is the real challenge of pluralism."

Jews today are confronted more than ever before by the spectre of those who do not think or practise the way they do. Not only is this true in the potential divide between Judaism and other religions, but it's perhaps even more poignantly to be found in the relationship between fellow Jews who feel and relate to Judaism in fundamentally diverse ways. One response, of course, would be to look at this pluralistic hypothesis as a nightmare, with influence from the outside being the last thing to be wished for if it diverts the believer from the "true path."

The argument is not hard to fathom. If the onslaught of secular modernity can be likened to a bit of a flood, swamping Jewry with enticements toward compromise or outright surrender, then isn't the most rational response to build an ark, so to speak, shut out the waters of acculturation and wait it out? Or perhaps this, ironically, may testify to an already weak faith, if it can be so easily disrupted by different perspectives and ideas.

It often seems that dialogue between Jews of different religious and political views has virtually disappeared, replaced in a fear-ridden Jewish community by separation and exclusion. Has Spinoza's thesis – that only anti-Semitism unites the Jews – reached an ironic fruition in contemporary Judaism?

The post-Enlightenment fracturing of any religious consensus has never been mended, leaving us with only "support for Israel" and "remember the six million" as the shattered remnants of things upon which Jews can agree.

It does not bode well, this toxic inability or refusal to communicate. We would do better to speak directly to, rather than across, one another.

Chabon scores with witty Union

The Yiddish Policeman's Union by Michael Chabon, Harper Collins.

Books

Bernard Baskin

In 2001, the Pulitzer Prize was awarded to Michael Chabon's astonishing novel The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay. It was a high-spirited and richly imagined work, exhilarating in style and fecund in story and character.

The absurd plot has it that in 1948, Israel loses its struggle for independence and the American government offers the defeated and homeless Jews a temporary haven in Alaska – to be returned to the United States after 60 years.

Two million refugee Jews are resettled in an "interim district" – the territory of Sitka. Yiddish becomes the new official language. Shopping options include a kosher mart, a Walgreen's, and a Big Macher outlet store. Detectives are known as "shammes," police officers as latkes, and cellphones as shofers.

The so-called "frozen chosen" face a bleak and uncertain future. In addition to their other woes, they are surrounded by unfriendly Tlingit Indians.

The novel begins just several months before the "Reversion" when, once again, uprooted Jews must find a new home.

What concerns Meyer Landsman, a sardonic, irreverent, hard-drinking detective and his partner, Berko Shemets, a native Alaskan Tlingit who has been raised as a Jew, is the mysterious murder of Mendel Shpilman, the son of the chief rabbi of the Verbover chassidic sect.

The victim, at one time, had been revered for his learning and charisma. Some believed that he possessed supernatural powers and might even be the prophesied Messiah. Now a cadaver in a seedy rundown hotel, he is forsaken by his family and fellow chassidim as a hopeless heroin addict and despised homosexual.

The plot becomes involved and convoluted. The two detectives eventually find the murderer, as they also unearth a cabal that seeks to rebuild the ancient Temple in Jerusalem with the help of fundamentalist Christians.

What will be of special interest to many readers is the author's masterful use of language. His style is fluent, evocative and witty.

Rabbi Heskel Shpilman is described as "a deformed mountain, a giant ruined dessert, a cartoon house with the windows shut and the sink left running. A millionaire could cover a Rolls-Royce with the fine black silk-and-velvet expanse of the rebbe's frock coat and trousers. It would require the brain strength of the 18 greatest sages in history to reason through the arguments against and in favour of classifying the rebbe's massive bottom as a creature of the deep, a man-made structure or an unavoidable act of God."

Landsman, watching the sky, feels that it "is like a mosaic pieced together from the broken shards of a thousand mirrors, each one tinted a different shade of gray. The winter sky of southeastern Alaska is a Talmud of gray, an inexhaustible commentary on a Torah of rain clouds and dying light."

The Yiddish Policeman's Union "is an entertaining, counter-factual fantasy that examines – however obliquely – such themes as exile, the quest for home and security, the meaning of faith and the importance of community.

Jewish Genealogy – Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish
Highway

As we read the Torah, we are given quite a clear record of the births and deaths of its historic figures. Thousands of years later, there is little doubt who begat whom.

Our own extended family trees, however, are rarely that clear.

That's why it's ironic that one of the best tools to investigate our history is one of the most modern – the Internet. With a bit of research and luck, you may be able to shed new light on your family history. Today, the very best place to start your hunt for your Jewish past.

When I first wrote about "JewishGen: The Home of Jewish Genealogy" several years ago, I felt it ranked among the very best Jewish sites of any type. I'm delighted to report that it's still thriving. [jewishgen.org] JewishGen is actually many sites in one. In addition to its own extensive resources, it also hosts many other related genealogical websites. Start off your travels in the Frequently Asked Questions area. This massive document will not only give you an overview of the site but will tell you how to get started in Jewish genealogy with advice about everything from finding ocean liner passenger lists going back to 1800 to locating a local Jewish genealogy society. [tinyurl.com/ytjbzc]

Next, check if you have relatives in the site's massive database, Family Tree of the Jewish People. If you are lucky to find relatives (or would like to enter your own information), the page is set up like a standard family tree in which you fill in the blanks. [jewishgen.org/gedcom/]

You can link up with family you never knew you had at JewishGen Family Finder. It contains "100,000 ancestral surnames and 18,000 town names, and is indexed and cross-referenced by both surname and town name." This incredible database is the work of over 80,000 Jewish genealogists worldwide. By the way, before you can do a search, you will be asked to create a free account for yourself – understandable since they want to add names of people interested in Jewish genealogy. [jewishgen.org/jgff/]

Did you grow up hearing all about life in the ancestral town of Máriafürd but you have no idea where it is (or how to spell it)? Type the name (or a reasonable guess) into ShtetlSeeker – Town Search and you'll get a map of that corner of that corner of the world. [jewishgen.org/ShtetlSeeker] And have you forgotten how far it is from Plonsk to Minsk? Just plug the longitude and latitude into the Distance Calculator to find out it's 94.5 kilometres. [jewishgen.org/jos/]

At some point in your travels, you'll have questions about the best way to research your family's history. The JewishGen Discussion Group offers a moderated e-mail list you can subscribe to. [tinyurl.com/2g7exj] But before you fire off your question, check to see if it's already been answered in the group's database of 100,000 messages. [tinyurl.com/2exfrx]

Do you have a precious family document or letter but don't understand what it says? Or a picture with people you can't identify. Scan it, upload it and post it to ViewMate. Someone is bound to know what it's all about. When I visited this section, I found people looking for translations from Russian, Yiddish, German and Polish, or some who just wanted to share their keepsakes. This is an amazing place to browse other people's treasures. [data.jewishgen.org/viewmate/]

In the Projects section, you'll find a link to the Holocaust Global Registry, which has been set up to help survivors who are looking for family members, and for child survivors searching for their identity. You will also find links to the JewishGen Online Worldwide Burial Registry, the Yizkor Book Project and a site called Genealogy by Genetics. Through DNA testing, they help "genealogists find lost relatives when the paper trail ends and the brick wall takes its place." [jewishgen.org/#Projects]

There is much more to JewishGen and that's why this is such an incredible resource. And like all our family trees, the more you probe, the more surprises you are bound to find. Finally, now that you're a budding genealogist yourself, don't miss the article with the irresistible title, "Publish before you Perish." [tinyurl.com/2d3thq]

Former premier Bill Davis to head commission

"We can't break it down into details at this point," Tory said. "There are many questions that have to be answered. There are many stakeholders out there."

In remarks to reporters the next day in Guelph, Premier Dalton McGuinty strongly criticized the Conservative plan.

"If they want to take a half a billion dollars out of the public system and put that into private schools, then they can vote for Mr. Tory. If they want to segregate children in classes according to their faith at home, then they can support Mr. Tory," McGuinty said.

He added that "one of the reasons for our success as a pluralist, multicultural society is because we bring all the kids together in the same classrooms."

Education Minister Kathleen Wynne charged that the Tory plan will take money out of public education.

"When I knock on doors, families tell me they want investments in our public education system," Wynne said.

"This latest distraction highlights Tory's lack of understanding of publicly funded education. The end result of this poorly thought out policy is gutting the publicly funded education system in favour of private religious schools."

Representatives from faith communities were at the Queen's Park press conference, including Stuart Lewis, executive director of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS); Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Ira Walfish, chair of the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools.

All have fought to have faith schools funded by in the province and were pleased with Tory's announcement.

"This is good. This is broadening the faith-based system," Walfish told The CJN. "We're excited and a commission makes sense. [The Conservatives] really are committed to this… what this could do for the Jewish community is mind-boggling."

But Walfish also stressed that his coalition is non-partisan.

"If the Liberals want to introduce a policy [like this], then we'll sit at the table with them," he said.

English commended Tory on choosing Davis to lead the commission. "We think this is an excellent initiative."

Canadian Jewish Congress also praised the Davis appointment, saying that he would instill confidence that "the process of integrating faith-based schools… will proceed fairly for the benefit of public schools and all Ontario residents."

Also present at the news conference were lawyer Aaron Blumenfeld and his daughter, Nirelle, who will attend Ulpanat Orot high school next year.

"This [announcement] means a lot for my dad," she said. "He's going to pay $40,000 for three children this year in school [fees]."

Blumenfeld, who is involved with the OAJDS, said the announcement was "exactly what should happen." He added that the "majority of Jewish schools already fulfil the provincial criteria."

Also on hand were representatives of the Hindu, Sikh, Muslim and Coptic Christian communities.

For years, many Jewish, Muslim, Sikh and non-Catholic Christian groups, among others, have argued that the province's Roman Catholic schools enjoy preferential status.

The ruling Ontario Liberals have maintained that they are constitutionally obligated to fund Catholic schools, saying they have a clear mandate to obey the 1867 Constitution, which protects existing rights for denominational schools of the time and requires Ontario to maintain a publicly funded Catholic school system.

In 1999, the United Nations Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) ruled that this funding is discriminatory, violating Canada's obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and that the province should fund other faith-based schools as well. The UNHRC censured the province again on this issue in 2005.

"We have a Catholic school system that is… thriving within our public system right now," Tory said. "[T]hat is a great model for how the principles of faith-based learning and public system standards can successfully coincide."

In the mid-1980s, Davis' Progressive Conservative government extended public funding to Catholic high schools. Tory was an aide to Davis at the time.

*Operating Cash Flow is an additional but lesser known tool to assist retail investors in identifying stock values. In my experience, using Operating Cash Flow to value stock has been shown to assist, confirm, or challenge the value of stocks held by prospective clients. By experience, the use of OCF (Operating Cash flow multiples) may highlight certain shortcomings in using Earnings per Share, EBITDA and P/E ratios to value public stocks.

Outremont candidate sees himself as a 'critical friend' of Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Outremont Liberal party candidate Jocelyn Coulon has always considered himself a friend of Israel and was taken aback by B'nai Brith Canada's July 20 call for party leader Stéphane Dion to "disqualify" him from the byelection in the federal riding because of his "well-documented anti-Israel bias."

"It came out of the blue," Coulon said last week in an interview. "I have always considered myself to be a friend of Israel - a critical friend, but a friend."

Coulon, 50, is a respected Quebec journalist and academic - he is a frequent commentator on television and currently a professor at the Université de Montréal, which is in the riding. He is a star candidate in what is considered a Liberal stronghold whose seat was left vacant with the departure earlier this year of Jean Lapierre.

The byelection is expected this fall. Also in the running are former diplomat Gilles Duguay for the Conservative party, former quebec environment minister Thomas Mulcair for the NDP – considered Coulon's strongest challenger – and Jean-Pierre Gilson for the Bloc Québécois.

In an interview, B'nai Brith legal counsel Moïse Moghrabi said Coulon's extensive collection of writings, viewable on the web site www.cerium.ca, attest to his biases against the United States and Israel, as well as his "wrongheaded" views on topics like Iran and terrorist groups like Hamas.

For example, Moghrabi said Coulon has, as early as 2004, used the word "massacre" when referring to U.S. actions, has referred to the terrorist threat as "insignificant," and last year wrote that Hamas should be seen as a negotiating partner.

Moghrabi expressed concern that if the Liberals form the next government, Coulon, whose expertise is international affairs, could become defence minister or "point man" on international affairs

"[Coulon] said his thinking is in line with the Liberal party, but it is not," Moghrabi said. "He could eventually influence Canadian policy."

As of last week, however, B'nai Brith appeared to have found few if any allies in calling for Coulon's nomination to be rescinded. French-language newspapers Le Devoir and La Presse, both of which Coulon has written extensively for, ardently defended his intelligence, humanity and integrity.

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler attended Coulon's campaign launch, and in an interview, agreed with the assessment of Coulon as a "critical friend" of Israel.

"Look, he has written 160 pieces for La Presse, and there are things I agree with and things I disagree with. But he is a supporter of the basic principles of Canadian foreign policy, and that should be the benchmark," Cotler said.

Referring to B'nai Brith's position, Cotler said you can always "single out" positions you disagree with, "but that cannot be the basic for judging whether you are a suitable candidate.

"It has to be judged on overall experience and expertise on domestic and international issues," he said.

The Quebec-Israel Committee's director of public affairs, Philippe Elharrar, likewise felt that whatever "ambiguity" might have existed over Coulon's positions were clarified by his recent pronouncements on the Middle East, which, Elharrar said, are in "perfect symbiosis" with Liberal party policy.

Coulon told The CJN that while he has certainly criticized the government of Israel, he has also shown support, for example when Israel built a "protective wall" against terrorists and when then-prime minister Ariel Sharon withdrew from Gaza.

Coulon acknowledged that he did write about the need to negotiate with Hamas, but only through the authority of Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, and only on the condition that Hamas renounce terrorism, recognize Israel and accept the "Oslo process."

"Obviously, they have not," Coulon said. "It is a terrorist organization and we should not deal with it."

Coulon said that while he has used the term "massacre," he was referring to the perceptions of "one billion Muslims" reacting to images they saw regularly on Al-Jazeera television.

"Did I use strong words? Yes. But I write a column, and columnists often use strong words from the emotion of the moment. I think I have the right to be judged based on my entire body of work, not a word here or there."

Coulon visited Israel in 1993, just as the Oslo process was being commemorated on the White House lawn, and he was deeply impressed by Israel's vitality and democratic spirit.

Coulon said that for the first time, he was also able to truly grasp Israel's vulnerability as a "small country surrounded by hostile neighbours."

At the same time, Coulon has expressed empathy for the situation of the Palestinians, and while he has been critical of Israeli government policies, he said he has always tried to reach a nuanced and thought-out position.

"I read everything I can, and then I write," Coulon said.

Coulon regrets the fact that B'nai Brith did not try to meet with him before calling on Dion to withdraw his nomination, so that he "could have explained the context of each column."

But none of this, as far as I could see, is in any way correlated or referenced to the present day. It is strictly a historical context and reading of the Qur'an by a Qur'anic scholar," he told the Post.

In response, Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Len Rudner said that even if the comments were made about Islam in the 14th century, the screeners still need to consider the "context of what is going on in the world today.

"And while the true meaning of jihad is a matter for religious authorities to debate… there are some people today who believe that jihad is physical and is violent, and the last thing that these people need is additional encouragement," Rudner said.

According to Reports
By
will return next week

Despite promises that VisionTV content would be monitored more closely after complaints followed the July 14 show, another episode of Dil Dil Pakistan that included Ahmad aired the following week on July 21.

Although the second broadcast was blamed on the show's producer being distracted by his daughter's upcoming wedding, VisionTV's president and CEO Bill Roberts released a statement on July 23 that condemned Ahmad's comments.

"Any statements by Mr. Ahmad that infer or encourage violence are not and will not be defended by VisionTV. Such statements run counter to our mission and long-standing track record of celebrating, reflecting and respecting Canada's many faith communities," Roberts said.

In addition to the statement that condemned Ahmad's views, VisionTV has banned him from appearing on further broadcasts, and Roberts said he will create a task force that will include members of the faith community to review the station's policies and procedures.

Rudner said he is pleased with the way VisionTV has responded to the controversy.

"Frankly, it is what we would expect from a respectable and responsible broadcasting organization, and we think VisionTV is both of those things," Rudner said.

In the broadcaster's defence, Rudner said he can understand that the programmers may have been unaware of Ahmad's reputation for vilifying Jews through his writing.

"My point of view isn't that they should have known before, it's that, they know now, so what are you going to do? I think that the proof will be in the pudding, but Vision's statement appears to indicate that they are acting properly."

Back to school... again

By CARALEE SALOMON
Special to The CJN

Zev Zelman

Zev Zelman, 31, glides comfortably into his seat at a west-end Montreal café. With a grilled chicken sandwich and a Snapple for lunch, he quietly confides, "I promised God that if I passed my exam I'd never mix milk and meat again."

The test he refers to, the one he recently passed, is Quebec's notorious bar exam, the difficult rite of passage for law school graduates, who must pass it before articling and being admitted as a lawyer to the Quebec Bar Association.

Five years ago, and four years after graduating from McGill University with a BA in industrial relations, Zelman left behind a comfortable job trading mutual funds at CIBC and returned to school, enrolling in law at the Université de Montréal.

Tucking into his chicken sandwich, sans cheese, he readily admits that "going back to school was the best decision I ever made. I wouldn't change a thing."

Committed to making a future for himself in Montreal, he says he knew the CIBC job "wasn't going to take me to where I eventually wanted to be."

He'll soon make his long-awaited return to the working world, this time as an articling student at a corporate law firm in Montreal.

But it certainly wasn't always easy.

"On the one hand, you realize that you're not 19 or 20 anymore, when you could study less, party more and get away with it," he says.

On the other hand, heading back to university for the second time meant he took the work more seriously.

"I wasn't trying to find myself this time. I knew what I wanted to do and I needed to commit to the work."

Elated with his accomplishment, Zelman sees a rosy future ahead. "I can basically write my own ticket at this point."

Susan Molnar, a Montreal-based career counsellor, sees a lot of clients who feel stuck or bored in their careers and want to make a change by going back to school.

It's a serious decision, she says, and one that requires a lot of honest reflection. The consequences of going back to school, she says, can range from having to live on a student budget after getting used to a steady income to more subtle impacts.

"I see a lot of doctoral students who have a hard time managing relationships, particularly their romantic ones," Molnar says. "They've lost their social life and feel isolated. On top of that, they've lost their professional identity, which is huge."

So, how do you know if going back to school is right for you?

"Ask yourself whether you need another degree to advance your career or are you doing it for the prestige or for the personal challenge," she says. "Ask yourself whether another degree will improve your lifestyle."

Molnar says often, people who enrolled in a program thought it was the answer, but ended up in the exact same spot three or four years later, except unemployed and further in debt.

After years in a career helping job-seekers find work, Molnar has learned that advanced or multiple degrees don't always translate into better or higher paying jobs. "Unless you're entering a field where the degree is essential to the practice, real work experience wins over more education," she says.

"If you're going back to school for a better salary, find out what your career path will be like," she says. "If you have to start at an entry-level position, research where you would be in three years and then, three years after that. Get a sense of what the future holds before you dive in."

As for Zelman, he's looking forward to moving into his own apartment this summer after starting work.

He says his father once told him, "'Your twenties are for learning, your thirties are for earning.' I started law school at 27 and I can't think of a better way to have spent the last four years."

Top 5 tips on how to save for a return to school

Brad Wise, a financial advisor with SFL Investments in Montreal, offers some ways to mitigate the financial impact of leaving the workforce to head back to school.

Start investing already! If you're 25 and don't have any investments, don't freak out. But know that money sitting in a bank account is losing value. If you want to make sure you're covered for future eventualities, invest it.

Meet with a financial advisor. Shop around until you find an advisor you trust. Decide if it's more important to hire someone with years of investment experience, or someone younger who can relate to your lifestyle, and with whom you'll grow from university through to retirement years.

Turn bad debt into good debt: Although credit cards are easily accessible, many have high interest rates. Try to limit your credit card debt and find solutions with lower interest rates, such as lines of credit with the bank. A few percentage points could save you a lot of money in the long run and potentially take years off paying down your debt.

Open a high-yield savings account. This isn't a way to get rich, Wise says, but it is a way to at least keep up with inflation. Some financial institutions offer savings accounts with higher interest rates than banks. If you tend to leave money in your bank account but aren't ready to invest it for the long term, this is a great option to at least generate some interest while ensuring the safety and liquidity of your savings.

Borrow up to $20,000 from your RRSP. If you are enrolled in a qualifying educational program, then the federal government's Lifelong Learning Plan allows you to borrow up to $10,000 a year, up to a total of $20,000, from your RRSP to help finance you or your spouse's education over a four calendar-year period. That money won't be taxed as income if it's repaid to your RRSP over the 10 years following its withdrawal. Consider it an interest-free loan from your future self. "Remember that if you have debt, your paycheque isn't all money in your pocket," warns Wise. "On top of loans, you still have rent and car payments. If you're re-entering the workforce after a few years, you'll probably need to invest in a new wardrobe and you might also have to pay dues to a professional order," he says.

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special the The CJN

A Taste of Nostalgia by Rabbi Abraham J. Twerski, and Judi Dick (Mesorah/Artscroll) is not just another Jewish cookbook. It's actually a storybook that includes 150 recipes that nourish the body, along with nostalgic stories, traditions and vintage photos that nourish the spirit and soul. This warm and wonderful book of Jewish "soul food" is bound to become a reference book for Jewish holidays and special celebrations.

The authors explain that food has always occupied a pivotal place in Jewish culture. Jewish mothers expressed their love for the children through food. Special days in the Jewish calendar are often associated with certain foods. The charming chassidic stories and recipes are arranged in chronological order, according to the Jewish year, using simple ingredients that were probably available in the shtetl 100 years ago.

Shabbat recipes include Mommy's Chicken Soup, Friday Night Farfel, Chopped Eggs and Onions and Arbes (Nahit). Special dishes for other holidays include Moroccan Fish, Gedempte Honey Chicken, Kishka and Helzel, as well as Babka with a Twist. You'll even learn how to make schmaltz and gribenes. These are not recipes for the faint of heart – or for those with a heart condition! But this unique cookbook will definitely touch your heart.

There are many varieties of kugel to choose from, including Lisa's Challah Kugel, Onion Kugel, Cholent Kugel, Overnight Potato Kugel, Eggless Sweet Potato Kugel, Yerushalmi Kugel and a rich Milchig Sweet Lukshin Kugel. You'll also find plump Cheese Crepes for a Crowd and a wonderful recipe for Caramel-Topped Cheesecake – all excellent for summertime entertaining!

"If you use our recipes for blintzes, you will have true gourmet blintzes, not like those of Shepsel.

"Shepsel was a porter, who barely earned enough to put bread on his table. One time, upon delivering a parcel to a wealthy man, Shepsel saw the man enjoying a tasty dish of blintzes.

"When he returned home he said to his wife, 'Yentl, only the rich people can enjoy this world. I saw a rich man eat delicious blintzes that made my mouth water.'

"'You want blintzes?' Yentl said. 'I'll make you blintzes, just like the rich people.'

"Having no eggs or refined flour, Yentl made a batter of coarse flour and water. Having no cheese, she filled the blintz with mashed potatoes. Having no fresh butter, she fried the blintz in recycled oil.

"Shepsel tasted the blintz and promptly spat it out. 'Those rich people are meshuge [insane]. I can't understand what they find so good about blintzes!'"

The following blintz recipe comes from co-author Rabbi Twerski's daughter-in-law, Hendel. These blintzes are super rich and super delicious. If you have the time but don't have the crowd, they can be frozen and used at your pleasure. Enjoy!

CHEESE CREPES FOR A CROWD

Crepes
7 eggs (extra-large)
3 cups flour
3 cups milk
1/2 cup sugar
2 tsp. vanilla sugar
1/8 tsp. salt
1/2 cup oil
1 cup water
oil, butter or margarine for frying

Filling
1 1/2 lb. farmer cheese (dry cottage cheese)
8 oz. plain cream cheese, whipped
8 oz. sour cream
1/2 cup sugar
1 packet vanilla sugar
1/2 cup confectioners' sugar

Combine crepe ingredients in a bowl and blend together. Place a very lightly greased frying pan over medium heat. When it is hot, coat the bottom lightly with batter. Fry briefly and turn out of the pan when slightly browned. Repeat with remaining batter, regreasing the pan as needed.

Mix the filling ingredients together. With the cooked side of the crepes facing you, divide the blintz filling evenly so that each crepe has the same amount of filling. Fold the sides over the filling and then roll up the crepe. Fry on both sides until golden. May be eaten immediately or rewarmed in a 350-degree oven (or even served at room temperature). Yield: 35 blintzes.

MILCHIG SWEET LUKSHEN KUGEL

This recipe is a cut above the rest. Co-author Judi Dick writes, "I think I got the recipe from my friend Mindel Press many years ago. I don't make it often, but only because it's too good and is impossible to resist. It's very rich. Just reading the ingredients is enough to put on a couple of pounds. For that once-in-a-while special meal – try it!"

1 lb. medium noodles, cooked al dente
6 extra-large eggs, beaten
3 cups milk
1 lb. sour cream
1 lb. cottage cheese
1 tsp. almond extract or lemon zest
1 1/2 cups sugar

Combine all the ingredients in a large pot or mixing bowl. Mix thoroughly, making sure the sugar is dissolved.

Place in the refrigerator for 8 hours or overnight. Preheat oven to 350. Pour the mixture into an ungreased 9x13-in. pan. (Do NOT use a disposable pan. It is actually 8x12 in. and is too small to hold the entire mixture.)

Bake uncovered for 1 1/2 hours.

'You can't expect the Red Cross to go in with guns blazing'

Ever since her husband's abduction, Goldwasser has tirelessly campaigned for his and the other Israeli soldiers' release.

In her speech at a rally in New York last month on behalf of her husband and the other kidnapped Israeli soldiers, she demanded to know: "Where is the Red Cross?"

The international organization, however, insisted it has been doing all it can to gain access to Ehud Goldwasser, Eldad Regev and Gilad Shalit, Israeli soldiers kidnapped last summer by Hezbollah and Hamas during raids on Israeli soil.

The International Committee of the Red Cross has "in fact, taken the matter of the three captured Israeli soldiers seriously from the very onset," said the organization's spokesperson, Simon Schorno. The Red Cross, he added, brought up the issue "every time we met with Hamas officials and Hezbollah officials."

In addition, the organization's website features an interview in which its president, Jakob Kellenberger, states: "We deeply deplore the fact that the Hezbollah in Lebanon and the Palestinian factions in Gaza have so far denied our delegates access, and that several attempts to transmit family news such as Red Cross messages or to obtain a sign of life were rejected."

Schorno said the Red Cross has been unsuccessful in repeated attempts to gain access to the Israelis.

"We made a series of public calls for the three soldiers to be treated according to basic principles of humanity," he said. "It's a very pressing issue, one that unfortunately has not developed in any substantial way.

Ehud Goldwasser

Eldad Regev

Gilad Shalit

Marc Stern, assistant executive director and general counsel of the American Jewish Congress, said the Red Cross is doing all it can given the nature of the terrorist organizations holding the soldiers.

"What's perplexing is people are blaming the Red Cross when really it's Hezbollah and Hamas," Stern said. "You can't expect the Red Cross to go in with guns blazing to free these guys."

The Red Cross "reached out to us," he added. "They are, as far as we can tell, working to establish contact with the soldiers."

Representatives from the UJA-Federation of New York and Jewish Community Relations Council of New York, which helped organize the rally that featured several prominent local politicians and high-ranking Jewish leaders, did not respond to requests for comments.

Stern said he believed that people in the Jewish community are unfairly targeting the Red Cross because of their memories of past misdeeds, including the organization's refusal until last summer to recognize Israel's Magen David Adom.

"The Red Cross didn't exactly distinguish itself during World War II," Stern said, referring to widespread criticism that it didn't do enough for those in the concentration camps. "Now they are a different Red Cross. It's not fair to act as if nothing has changed."

In response to a question about how effective the Red Cross has been in trying to reach the kidnapped soldiers, the Israeli consulate in New York released a statement saying that "Israel is calling upon all international organizations, including the UN and the Red Cross, to fulfil their mission and obtain information about the kidnapped soldiers and help secure their immediate release and return home to their families."

Schorno said the Red Cross would continue to press Hamas and Hezbollah.

"We're not taking no for an answer," he said. "We're not letting this slip off the radar."

CIC praised MacKay's announcement

The assistance will comply with a 2006 process adopted by the so-called Quartet of peace brokers – the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – that endorses "needs-based assistance directly to the Palestinian people, including essential equipment, supplies, and support for health services, support for the uninterrupted supply of fuel and utilities, and basic needs allowances to poor Palestinians."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) praised MacKay's announcement.

"We support Canada engaging in the region and supporting the stability of a moderate and accountable Palestinian leadership that can serve as a credible partner to Israel," said CIC chair Moshe Ronen.

But Ronen cautioned the government to ensure that the aid is properly used and monitored.

"We expect that Canada will establish benchmarks for the necessary reforms the PA must undertake to retain the confidence of Canada," he said. "The CIC commends [Canada] for taking… the necessary precautions to ensure that none of this support is accessed by Hamas."

New PA plank omits 'armed struggle'

JTA

RAMALLAH — For the first time, a political platform proposed by the Palestinian Authority does not call for "armed struggle."

The plank presented last Friday by PA Prime Minister Salaam Fayad instead cited "national opposition to the occupation." It includes language regarding the "attainment of an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement consisting of pre-1967 borders, Jerusalem as the capital of both states, the honouring of past agreements between the two" and a resolution to the refugee problem based on UN resolutions, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Salaam Fayad

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon said Israel should try to work with PA President Mahmoud Abbas, head of the more moderate Fatah party, as Israel has a partner for peace for "the first time in seven years." Israel has yet to issue an official reply. Officials have not received the new platform in writing, nor has it been voted on by the Palestinian Parliament.

The platform also declares the PA's intention to exert its rule over the Gaza Strip, which was taken over last month by Hamas. Abbas vowed that an internal 200-page report detailing the failures of officials in handling the Hamas takeover would be implemented immediately. Hamas has vowed to continue its armed resistance against Israel.

Abbas told reporters that he hoped to broker peace within a year and has the support of U.S. President George W. Bush and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Arab League reps visit Israel

Egypt and Jordan's foreign ministers met with the Israeli prime minister to discuss the Arab League's peace initiative. "We were invited as representatives of the Arab League in order to advance the Arab peace initiative," Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit told reporters at a press conference last week with Israeli President Shimon Peres. "This is a time of opportunity." During their visit to Israel, the Jordanian and Egyptian ministers also met with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, and paid a rare visit to the Knesset, where they were scheduled to address the foreign affairs and defence committee. They were also scheduled to meet with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "It is the first time the Arab League has authorized a delegation to come to Israel," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said, calling the visit "historic." Yet in a contradictory statement, the Egyptian state information service released a communique Saturday saying Aboul Gheit was "representing Egypt and only Egypt, not the Arab League" during his visit.

Iran nuke plant delayed

Israeli media reported that the completion of Iran's first atomic power plant will be delayed by more than a year, to the fall of 2008, a Russian nuclear subcontractor said. "Today, we can say for sure that to launch the Bushehr nuclear plant this autumn is unrealistic," Ivan Istomin, the head of Energoprogress, a company doing the work for the Russian state-owned firm building the Iranian plant, told Russia's RIA news agency. Despite pressure from western countries to halt work on the plant, Russia has said it will stick to the project. The Russian company building Iran's nuclear plant had announced a delay in its launch once before due to payment problems. The plant was supposed to open in September 2007.

Israelis moving to Germany

The number of Israelis moving to Germany is growing. Newly released German immigration statistics show a sharp rise in the number of Israelis becoming German citizens. In 2006, 4,313 Israelis became German citizens, a 50 per cent increase over the previous year. While foreigners can apply for naturalization after eight years living in the country, they generally must forfeit their former citizenship. There are some exceptions, including Jews who lost their German citizenship due to Nazi persecution, as well as the children and grandchildren of Jews who fled Nazi Germany. Many Israelis fall into this category.

Steinhardt plans changes in funding he provides

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Unhappy with the results of his $125-million investment in Jewish causes over the past 12 years, philanthropic trailblazer Michael Steinhardt says he is scaling back and refocusing the efforts of his signature foundation.

Michael Steinhardt

"The last six months have been particularly hard because I came to the realization that I was doing things I really did not want to be doing, that were really not where my head was," Steinhardt said last Wednesday in an interview with JTA at his Manhattan offices. "I felt that some of the places I spent money were not where I really wanted to be spending money, that I knew were not achieving what I wanted to achieve, and they created conflicts for me and difficulty for me, and I think that period is over."

The hedge-fund mogul made waves in the mid-1990s, when he retired from the money management business with roughly half a billion dollars in the bank, pledging to devote his energies to the Jewish philanthropic world.

Steinhardt quickly made a significant impact through his foundations and Jewish Life Network think tank, becoming a founding partner of birthright israel, a program that supplies young Jews with free trips to Israel and is widely regarded as the most successful Jewish philanthropic initiative in decades. He also invested in several other groundbreaking efforts, including philanthropic partnerships that have generated tens of millions of dollars to boost day-school education and make synagogues more appealing to marginal members and unaffiliated Jews.

But now Steinhardt, well-known for acerbic comments and ruffling feathers, is slamming his own record and promising major changes. Any major shift by Steinhardt could prove potentially momentous for the Jewish community's new philanthropic landscape, where individual donors and private foundations, rather than local Jewish charitable federations, lead the way on a host of issues.

Steinhardt told JTA that he will be narrowing his foundation's attention to three major areas: creating follow-up programs for birthright participants after they return home; building a $100-million Fund for the Jewish Future, also known as Areivim, to transform formal and informal Jewish education; and the Jewish Early Childhood Education Initiative.

He voiced plans to end his financial support for at least 18 of the 100 or so initiatives that he funds, but opted not to discuss specifics on the record. In addition, Steinhardt said he will be stepping down as chair of the day-school initiative, the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), but he will continue his commitment of $1.5 million over five years.

In recent months, according to sources close to him, Steinhardt had become increasingly pessimistic about the Jewish world and the impact of his investments. He articulated this disappointment publicly in May at a banquet for Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

"I ask myself, overall, is the Jewish world any better today than it was 13 years ago? Have things really improved? Are we reaching more people?" he asked. "I don't have positive answers. Outside of our self-congratulatory bubbles, things haven't changed much."

Shortly after that, Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg stepped down as the Jewish Life Network's top professional, a post from which he had served as Steinhardt's top adviser on Jewish initiatives since the organization was founded in 1995. The departure marked the end of a prominent and ideologically improbable partnership between Steinhardt, a self-described atheist, and Rabbi Greenberg, an Orthodox theologian.

In recent months, the overall staff at the Jewish Life Network (JLN) has been reduced from 12 to seven, according to sources at the organization. Rabbi David Gedzelman remains its executive director.

Steinhardt has tapped the CEO of the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Detroit, Robert Aronson, to head the $100-million Areivim fund. The fund, which is co-chaired by Detroit billionaire William Davidson, will include 20 philanthropists who invest $5 million each. Steinhardt said 13 have signed on so far.

"I think Michael is taking a whole new look at JLN," Aronson told JTA. "It is a very good idea. I think it will energize him. He has had a tremendous impact on American Jewish philanthropy through his ideas and initiatives."

In total, Steinhardt has given an estimated $125 million to Jewish causes through the Judy and Michael Steinhardt Foundation and the Israel-based Steinhardt Family Foundation.

Steinhardt told JTA that while he will honour his previous financial commitments and maintain some level of support for many of the causes his foundations fund, he wants to focus in the future on crafting what he calls a "common Judaism" and developing programs that speak to the unaffiliated, as opposed to those who are already in some way connected to Judaism.

These have always been his objectives, he added, but the JLN occasionally has strayed from them.

He plans to step down as chair of the day-school partnership, a position he has held for 10 years.

"PEJE has been an outstanding organization," Steinhardt said. "It is exceptionally well run by Josh Elkin, its staff is terrific and I feel it has done unusually well in a variety of circumstances."

Still, Steinhardt said, while PEJE has helped build the Jewish day-school system, he wanted the organization to do more to help increase the number of non-Orthodox and unaffiliated Jews who attend day schools.

He challenged the claim in the National Jewish Population Survey of 2000-2001 that some 10 per cent to 15 per cent of non-Orthodox Jews attend day schools, saying the Steinhardt Social Research Institute at Brandeis University found that the number is closer to three per cent.

"You ask yourself, if PEJE didn't exist, what percentage of the non-Orthodox world would go to day schools?" he said. "Would it be much less than three per cent?"

Israel rebuilds forests burned by Hezbollah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BIRIYA FOREST, Israel — "For us, every tree is precious," said Joseph Karni, a rangy Jewish National Fund park ranger whose words trickled out in a rivulet of pain, anguish and regret.

As he talked, Karni cast a rueful glance at a scorched hill in the Biriya Forest, a natural reserve of great beauty, near Safed, which was damaged by barrages of Hezbollah rockets during last summer's Second Lebanon War.

JNF ranger Joseph Karni

Hezbollah gunners, attempting to hit Israeli army bases in the Galilee, fired more than 500 Katyusha missiles into the forest – igniting hundreds of wildfires, incinerating 250,000 trees, mainly highly combustible Jerusalem pines, and touching off the worst forest fires in Israel's history.

By the time the war ended last August, during which 119 Israelis were killed in 34 days of combat, 200 hectares, or 10 per cent, of this enchanting man-made forest had been burned beyond recognition.

On adjacent Mount Meron, Israel's largest nature reserve, 1,000 of 100,000 hectares were obliterated.

These figures may not sound like much, but when you consider the fact that only four per cent of Israeli territory is covered by forests, the real meaning of the catastrophe sinks in.

Karni, a former kibbutznik and a JNF employee for the past 25 years, personally witnessed the destruction. "It was terrifying, believe me," he recalled with a shudder.

A charred hillside in the Biriya Forest [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

He added, "The rockets fell from morning to night. You never knew when the next one would come crashing down. We were running after fires. Ninety-seven per cent of our workers stayed to fight the fires, even though civilians were permitted to leave the region. They risked their lives. We were lucky that none were killed."

A year after a United Nations ceasefire ended the fighting, sparked by an unprovoked Hezbollah ambush of an Israeli army patrol inside Israel, the JNF has begun the awesome and inspiring task of rehabilitating the Biriya Forest, a bucolic haven for hikers and picnickers alike.

Further north, much closer to the once quiet Lebanese border, the JNF is replanting parts of the Ramot Naftali Forest, which also absorbed the brunt of Hezbollah aggression.

In both cases, park rangers say, the work of rebuilding the forest, which was suddenly subjected to an entirely unexpected environmental disaster, will require at least a generation of effort and expense.

"Whole hillsides were burned," noted Karni, saying that it will cost 20,000 shekels to clear each hectare of deadwood.

According to Karni, 20 per cent of the Biriya Forest has already been replanted, all by volunteers from Israel and around the world.

"We've been flooded by requests for help," he said, watching Israeli and foreign volunteers busily pruning the lower branches of existing trees in order to make them grow faster and more fire resistant.

The volunteers, ranging in age from 15 to 17, are in Israel on a special six-week summer program, said Daniel Bush, the 30-year-old leader of a group of American volunteers.

Karni, a man who clearly savours the wonders of the outdoors, said that one-third of the forest will not be replanted so that nature can take its course.

Otherwise, the forest, lovingly planted on bleak and barren hillsides shortly after the birth of Israel in 1948, will be replenished with native species – oaks, cedars, pistachio, wild pear, olive, carob and pomegranate – rather than with non-native pines.

"It was a mistake in the first place to plant pines," said Karni, explaining that while they are fast growing and require little water, they are are too susceptible to fires.

By contrast, the newer species can better withstand flames and disease and, just as importantly, will encourage native birds, rodents and such mammals as jackals, rabbits, boars and gazelles to return to their natural habitat.

Eliyahu Cohen, a JNF forester who works with volunteers, said the pine trees still dotting the forest will be permitted to die out after their 80-year life span, and will be replaced with native species.

In the meantime, to the din of buzz saws, JNF workers are methodically cutting down charred trees.

The wood is sold to contractors, who in turn sell it to manufacturers of pallets, benches and outdoor furniture. Unsellable wood is converted into mulch.

As these developments unfold, Eitan Lebel is glad to report that business is back to normal. Lebel, the owner of the Bat Yaar Ranch, a family-oriented retreat in the middle of the Biriya Forest, said that last year's war drove off customers. "The place was empty."

But since last autumn, the ranch has been humming, offering clients the usual assortment of horseback riding, jeep tours, rope bridge walking high up in the trees, outdoor bowling and, for the younger set, a petting zoo, pita baking and creative workshops.

At the Ramot Naftali Forest – which overlooks the development town of Kiryat Shmonah and offers hazy views of the Lebanese towns of Bint Jbail and Maroun al-Ras, where fierce fighting broke out – JNF ranger Avi Fibak remembered the war.

"Ten to 15 Katyushas could fall in a minute," he said, noting that the firing began a week into the war. "I didn't see a flash. I could only hear the whoosh of incoming rockets. When they landed, there was a plume of black smoke, followed by a curtain of white smoke."

He was frightened.

"I was in shock," he admitted, standing on the edge of a ridge with a panoramic view of Kiryat Shmonah. "I didn't know where the rockets would land. I was paralyzed with fear."

He said that Hezbollah began shelling the town only after the Israeli army moved men and equipment there.

As Fibak recalls, firefighters extinguished raging fires in Kiryat Shmonah and surrounding fields before tackling forest fires.

The inferno destroyed 700 out of 14,000 hectares and badly damaged the cable car, a tourist attraction.

In his judgment, there were not enough firefighters and fire trucks to deal with the situation.

A year later, with new green shoots emerging from the blackened earth, the forest has begun to heal itself naturally. Volunteers have so far planted some 75,000 saplings, all indigenous to the area.

"Within 15 years, these trees will cover the charred sections of the mountain," said Fibak, a smile on his face.

Israel will be green again.

The Bell

Yankel plopped down on the dusty bench in back of the shul, exhausted from a long day of work. He wouldn't make it back to Chelm until the next day. Tonight he'd probably end up sleeping right here in the synagogue. That was no problem, he had done it many times before, but he was hungry. Yankel hadn't eaten all day. A man came over to him and extended his hand.

"Shalom aleichem."

"Aleichem shalom."

"You're passing through here?"

"Yes."

"Don't you have a place for the night?"

"Nope."

"Not to worry. You see that man in the front? That's Moses Krepnik. He's a textile merchant. Really wealthy. And really nice too. Make sure he sees you. He'll bring you home for dinner and let you stay overnight."

"Really?"

"And best of all, when you leave he'll give you a gift."

"A gift?"

"That's right."

"What kind of gift?"

"That's up to you."

"What do you mean?" asked Yankel, puzzled.

"You can choose any one thing from his house to bring home with you. That's what I mean. I recommend taking a golden cup or maybe one of those silver bowls. Oh, here he comes… good luck."

"Thank you!" Yankel called after him.

"Shalom aleichem, do you need a place for the night?"

"Yes, yes!"

"It would be my pleasure to host you."

Yankel delightedly followed his benefactor home, hardly believing his good fortune. Wow, look at that house, what a mansion!

And when they entered, Yankel's eyes opened even wider. The house shone with wealth, from the decorative golden vessels to the imported Persian rugs. The table, carved from a deep mahogany, was covered with a hand-embroidered tablecloth. The table was set with filigreed silverware, bone china plates and lead crystal goblets, just waiting to be filled. Near Moses rested a small, plain pewter bell. It looked strangely out of place in the midst of such elegance.

"Please sit down," invited Moses.

Moses took his seat and reached for the bell. He shook it and a dull ringing sound echoed through the room. Almost immediately, the double doors behind him swung open and liveried servants emerged bearing great silver trays piled with the most exotic delicacies imaginable. Yankel had never seen such a spread in all his life. The smell was so tempting, so sweet. He piled his plate high and dug in like someone who hadn't eaten in weeks, which in his case wasn't so far from the truth. When he had finished, Moses rang the bell again, and once more, servants entered, clearing away the empty plates, replacing them with clean ones and, of course, bringing out more delicious food. Moses patiently waited while Yankel stuffed himself, deriving genuine pleasure from giving this poor man a rare treat. Instead of bothering Yankel with questions, Moses let Yankel do what Yankel wanted to do – eat. When at last Yankel had had enough, Moses reached again for the bell.

"Wait!" burst out Yankel. "May I ring it?"

"Of course," laughed Moses, and handed the bell to his guest. Yankel looked at the heavy double doors. All was quiet and still. Slowly he rang the bell. And sure enough, the doors flew open and in came the servants bearing silver bowls of fragrant peaches, plums, grapes and sweet melons.

"As the Talmud says, there is always room for dessert," beamed Moses, taking a luscious cluster of grapes.

Yankel had made up his mind. As he blissfully chewed the soft honeydew, he knew what he would take home with him. No, not bowls of silver or gold, not soft velvety chairs. No, he would take the unassuming lamp whose genie showered such bounty — the bell itself!

And the next morning, after a delightful night's sleep, he knew just what to ask his host for. Moses seemed puzzled when Yankel asked for the bell, but happily gave it to him nonetheless. And after profusely thanking his host, Yankel made his way back to his family in Chelm.

"All right everyone, come here!" ordered Yankel, back home in his rundown shack. Proudly he placed the pewter bell on the creaking table. "Watch this," he whispered, reverently stroking the bell. He raised the bell and firmly shook it. It chimed. Everyone looked around. Nothing happened. Hmm, thought Yankel. Maybe it takes them time to get here from Warsaw. He waited for one hour, and then another. One by one, his children went outside to play. He rang the bell again and again. The solemn ringing echoed through his empty home.

This folktale from eastern Europe is a mashal, an allegory — which is a story with a moral lesson. What do you think is the lesson here?

SickKids doctors write child-care book

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

What's the first thing couples do when they find out they are going to have a baby?

Well, OK, first they tell their parents, best friends and hairdresser, and go out for a gourmet dinner. But then they head to the nearest bookstore for books on pregnancy and bringing up baby.

It used to be that Dr. Spock's Baby and Child Care was the unquestioned bible for nervous – and even not so nervous – couples. More recently other books have appeared, such as the series What to Expect (When You're Expecting; The First Year and The Toddler Years), by Arlene Eisenberg, Heidi Murkoff and Sandee Hathaway.

And now, Dr. Jeremy Friedman and the late Dr. Norman Saunders of Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children have produced a new book that is sure to join the ranks of books you must have. It is Canada's Baby Care Book: A Complete Guide from Birth to 12 Months Old (co-published by the Hospital for Sick Children and Robert Rose).

This book is a gem. It is easy to read, has many helpful pictures and is thorough. It is also open-minded, which is rare in books of this type.

For instance, while clearly stating the advantages of breast-feeding, formula is also recognized as an alternative feeding method. The important thing, the author's state, is to use feeding as a time for the mother (or father) to bond with the baby.

Friedman, who heads the division of pediatric medicine at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, observed that since Dr. Spock published his first book, there has been a great deal of research into all aspects of infant care.

"Dr. Spock's book, and many others, were based on opinions and traditional ways of doing things. We tried to take the best of scientific evidence, and translate it into practical information for parents," Friedman said.

He and Saunders recognized that families have different comfort levels with approaches to child rearing.

"Take sleep, for instance," Friedman said. "One approach is to let the baby cry a bit. Another is to never let the baby cry [before settling to sleep]."

The aim of Friedman and Saunders was to give complete information on all the approaches, along with hints about how to implement them. "Once you have the knowledge, you do what you think best. In the 1940s, it was do as the doctor tells you," Friedman said.

He noted that unlike most books, which are mainly text, Canada's Baby Care Book is "bright and engaging. The pictures tell you something it would take pages of text to explain."

An example is the section on swaddling babies, which includes photos and a written description.

The babies in the book are mainly offspring of SickKids personnel, including hospital residents, people who contributed to the book and patients. The photographs were taken by hospital photographers, often in the baby's home.

Sometimes, said Friedman, a little explanation can save a lot of anxiety for new parents. "There is a wide range of normal, and we assume that something is normal until it is proven not to be – unlike those books that consider a child sick until he is proven normal."

The book recognizes that society has changed since Dr. Spock's time, especially since so many mothers are in the work force. It covers issues such as choosing a day care, separation anxiety on the part of mother and baby, and how a stay-at-home mom can maintain her physical and mental health.

There are many issues, such as circumcision, that should be addressed before the birth, said Friedman, when the couple has time and leisure to make the proper decisions.

Friedman mused that he and Saunders might have included homeopathic and naturopathic considerations along with conventional medicine, but then you have to save something for the next book.

And there will be a next book. Friedman said that he and other colleagues are already starting on a book that will cover children from two to five years of age.

Rabbi claims to have the key to a happy home

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Aryeh Pamensky wants to make an impact on the world in a grand way.

As a marriage and relationship expert, his vision is to stem the tide of divorce and help build stronger, happier families.

Born in South Africa and brought up in Toronto, Rabbi Pamensky, 42, has been married for 16 years and is the father of eight children. He is a sought-after speaker who has shared his tools for a happy marriage with sold-out crowds around the world.

It saddens him that couples often settle for mediocre relationships.

"It is a tragedy, because there is potential for great [ones] literally around the corner," he said.

"The media is not helpful, because the most we learn about love is about the chase. There is little about creating healthy, long-term relationships."

There are not many places to turn to for information, he said. "In school, students get sex education, but no relationship education. They learn only the mechanics."

As a result, people tend to "stagger blindly, guessing and experimenting, hoping to stumble upon success, because they just don't know any different."

His mission, he said, is to help people make their marriages work, and to encourage them to be role models for their children.

With that in mind, Rabbi Pamensky launched a website last year, www.ydivide.com, which he describes as a "relationship station, designed to give quick tips in four or five seconds.

"I give people free information so they can create a relationship in which they want to live. My tag line is that a great marriage is built on the sum total of daily connections."

About 95 per cent of marriage is mundane, he said.

"Partners have to figure out how to connect every day. It doesn't have to be a sweeping connection but something little such as being an ear or saying sorry. Marriages are built on small things like that."

Turning a relationship around does not have to entail jumping over a huge chasm. "Small steps make a big difference."

Believe it or not, he said, friction is an important part of a marriage.

"With passion comes heat and friction. If that's gone, you've given up. 'Fire' is a good thing."

He also has tips on how to have a "good" fight.

"Find a private place to vent, and bite your tongue. Don't allow yourself to get out of control. As well, you should never say 'You never,' or 'You always,'" he advised.

"Make an appointment to resolve issues and commit to working through them. The greatest thing you can give your partner is the assurance that you will always be there, so you may as well work things out."

Every relationship is measured by your marriage, he said.

"If you learn how to fulfil your spouse on all levels, then every other relationship is impacted. If we take our masks off with our spouses, we gain the confidence to take our masks off with everyone. The result is that we have a lot of real, confident people walking around."

Working on a marriage is good for the kids, he said. "If you have a happy marriage, half of the parenting is taken care of, because the kids feel secure."

Rabbi Pamensky is so passionate about marriages "because I am into human greatness. I believe in growth, and living up to one's potential. The price of becoming a great spouse is becoming a great human being."

This should be one 'Fabuloso' play

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

What happens when two talented siblings combine on a theatre project? You get Fabuloso, a "domestic farce" focusing on a couple's stagnant marriage and what happens when an unbalanced old friend arrives to shake up their predictable world.

Linda and Daniel Kash, the progeny of late master violinist, Eugene Kash and famed soprano Maureen Forrester, star in and direct the play as part of Toronto's Summerworks Theatre Festival at the Tarragon Theatre Mainspace at 30 Bridgman Ave., starting Aug. 3.

The two have come together, along with fellow actors Jonathan Higgins, Angela Asher and multiple Gemini Award-winning actor, Nicholas Campbell, to put on a comedy by acclaimed playwright, John Kolvenbach, with Daniel directing and Linda playing a lead role.

At a special rehearsal put on for The CJN last week, the Kashes, Higgins and producer Hayley Tyson, who is married to Daniel, unveiled a glimpse of what audiences can expect to see on opening night.

If the five-minute preview was any indication, viewers will be grinning, smirking and laughing for the show's 65-minute duration.

Linda and Higgins, playing a husband and wife ground down by life's tedium, displayed spot-on comic timing as they executed Kolvenbach's rapid-fire lines in the opening scene, the characters tormenting and goading each other mercilessly.

"And we call this one of the 'slow' scenes," Daniel said.

Though many pop-culturists will remember Linda as The Lip Reader from a popular Seinfeld episode, her recurring role as the Philadelphia Cream Cheese Angel on the company's TV ads has made her instantly recognizable.

Higgins, who comes from a more dramatic acting background as well, praised Linda for her comedic abilities and said he was grateful to be able to work with "such a force. She really shakes things up on stage."

However, the Kashes initially felt some trepidation about working together on the project, fearing they'd push each other's buttons.

"You know how family can be," Daniel quipped.

"But it's working out fine," Linda interjected. "Not many people know me as well as Daniel… and I love having someone [directing] who cares so much about the play."

The Kashes kibbitzed continually throughout rehearsal, as only siblings can. But their laid-back relationship and easy back-and-forth feedback seemed to infuse the play with an added warmth that audiences should feel.

"I know Linda's giving it all she has every scene. And she's nailing it," Daniel said. "It's been great working with her."

Though both were born in Montreal, they call Toronto home and had their bar and bat mitzvahs at Holy Blossom Temple.

Manteca returns to stage and studio

By SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
Special to The CJN

"Reunion concert" might make you think of a group of old guys attempting to recapture their glory, and when that group is a favourite from your university days – two decades ago – you also fear they won't live up to your memories from concerts that wowed you back then.

I'm ecstatic to say that this is not so with the Toronto-based, Latin jazz-influenced big band known as Manteca, who recently played their first concert in nine years and have released a new album – Onward! – their ninth album and first studio recording since 1993.

Opening the Toronto Jazz Festival on June 22, Manteca was welcomed onto the stage at Nathan Phillips Square by a mixture of diehard fans and newbies curious about the band. The band's first number was a classic track, Extra Extra from their 1990 album of the same name. Led on congas by the incredibly energetic Matt Zimbel and bass aficionado Henry Heilig (two nice Jewish boys), Manteca proved to the audience that indeed, you can come back.

Manteca is not your parents' big band, although jazz fans of all ages will most certainly enjoy the band's sound – imaginative arrangements and focus on percussion, including bongos, timbales and congas, and a wide variety of horns and woodwinds. Manteca's music, which is spiced with Latin, world beat and more than a bit of funk, has always been incredibly easy to listen to – sultry and spine-tingling; energetic with stunning instrumentals and seamless transitions.

Live, the band forms a playful yet relaxed relationship with the audience. It is obvious they are at home on stage. On the CD, the feeling is much the same; their music is soothing and serene one moment, captivating and brimming with excitement the next.

"There's a camaraderie that has existed for 28 years," said Zimbel, "and I think it is evident in our music." In concert, with each song performed enthusiastically, Manteca proved the group has not lost its edge or rhythm, despite losing a few of its original members. Both live and on the CD, rookie players Kelly Jefferson on saxophones and Mark Ferguson on trombone have melded with the veterans to continue creating the distinctive Manteca sound.

FUGITIVE PIECES, EMOTIONAL ARITHMETIC FEATURED AT FILM FESTIVAL

Two new feature films related to the Holocaust, both adapted from novels by Canadian writers, have been selected to open and close the upcoming Toronto International Film Festival.

One of the world's most influential film festivals, Toronto's 32nd annual film fest opens Sept. 6 with a première screening of Fugitive Pieces, produced by Robert Lantos and based on the internationally bestselling novel by Toronto writer Anne Michaels. Directed by Jeremy Podeswa, the film tells the story of a Polish man haunted by his childhood experiences of the war, during which he was saved by a compassionate Greek archeologist.

"I'm truly overwhelmed to have this film in particular showcased in this way," said Podeswa. "I am equally pleased and excited for Anne Michaels, whose novel holds such a unique and special place in the hearts of those who live here and readers around the world."

Robyn Israel

The festival's closing film (on Sept.15) is also an adaptation of a Holocaust-related novel by a noted Canadian author. Emotional Arithmetic is based on the 1990 novel of the same name by the late Toronto writer Matt Cohen.

A drama, the film tells the story of the reunion of three Holocaust survivors and stars Max von Sydow, Gabriel Byrne, Susan Sarandon and Christopher Plummer. Two of the survivors, who had been held in an internment camp for Jews in France, discover the man who had protected them did not die at Auschwitz as previously thought, and arrange to meet him.

Emotional Arithmetic was shot last year in Quebec. It was directed by Paolo Barzman, who worked with Jefferson Lewis to adapt the novel. Cowan hailed both Emotional Arithmetic and Fugitive Pieces as "vibrant and high-profile Canadian films." A new David Cronenberg film is also slated to debut at the festival.

Casting Call: Encore Entertainment is holding cast auditions for a planned production of the Neil Simon play Chapter Two. Audition dates are Aug. 20 and 21 at Toronto Centre for the Arts. Please phone 416-733-0558 for an audition.

Book on Beth Am: Al and Rosalyne Federman, original members of Congregation Beth Am, have written an updated history of the congregation and the Beth Am Players. The history contains major events involving the synagogue from 1954 to 1978, when it merged with Beth David B'nai Israel. The section on Beth Am Players features colour photos, programs and insight information regarding the group that performed from 1957 to 1992.

To obtain a copy and receive an income tax receipt, send a donation of $25 or more to the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, 55 Yeomans Rd., Toronto, Ont. M3H 3J7 and mark it Beth Am Archives Fund.

Passages: Toronto's artistic community mourned the loss of Bluma Appel, activist, philanthropist and stalwart arts patron, who died of cancer on July 15, aged 87.

A pivotal supporter of the Canadian Stage Company for 25 years, Appel served on more than 40 boards and councils, including those of the St. Lawrence Centre, McMichael Gallery, National Gallery of Canada, Royal Ontario Museum, Canadian Opera Company, Saidye Bronfman Centre for the Arts and Telefilm Canada. In Niagara-on-the-Lake, where she long maintained a home, she supported the Shaw Festival and the Niagara Symphony.

Born and raised in Montreal, Appel was founder of the American Friends of Canada, which fostered significant new streams of funds and friends for cultural institutions such as the Art Gallery of Ontario, Willowbank School for the Restoration Arts and Stratford Festival. She also volunteered with and assisted numerous social and health-care organizations.

In 1983, the theatre in the St. Lawrence Centre was renamed the Bluma Appel Theatre after she funded its renovation. An officer of the Order of Canada, she was presented with an honorary Dora Mavor Moore Award in 2005. She received an honorary doctorate from University of Toronto in 2006 and another from Brock University this past spring.

Toronto festival showcases up-and-coming musicians

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Aspiring singers and musicians who crave attention for their artistic efforts will get some badly needed exposure thanks to the Canadian Rock and Video Entertainment Festival – or CraveFest, for short.

The first-ever CraveFest will be held from Aug. 14 to 16 at the Revival Bar, 783 College St., and culminates with the CraveFest Awards Night on Aug. 17 at The Mod Club, 722 College St.

The non-profit international music video awards festival is the brainchild of Sal Riino, owner and founder of Gem-Sen, a wholesale company based in Markham. Riino has ties to the music industry because his company includes a car audio division.

The purpose is to provide musicians with an outlet to be seen and heard. Musicians, signed or unsigned, can submit their videos to www.cravefest.com.

"Each video is entered on to an online interactive voting competition where the public votes for their favourite videos. The top videos will be featured at the festival," explains Carolyn Mendlowitz, marketing director for both CraveFest and Gem-Sen.

The evenings at the Revival Bar will include the showing of participants' videos and performances by up-and-coming musicians who might not normally have many chances to play in front of a live audience. The awards night will include performances with yet-to-be announced headliners.

CraveFest judges include Canadian Idol judge and music industry mover and shaker Farley Flex; musician Tara Slone, a contestant on Rockstar INXS and the new host of Inside Jam on SunTV; Alan Cross, radio personality and program director for 102.1 The Edge, and Darrin Pfeiffer, drummer for the band Goldfinger.

"I've have been involved from the get-go in terms of coming up with the strategy," explains Mendlowitz. "My main objective here is to help promote the event and come up with a marketing plan behind it. We would like to see it benefit musicians, not the ones you see on MTV, and we want to provide others a chance to be seen.

"We are catering to three different genres – rock, hip hop and dance/electronic/world – differentiating by both genre and whether a band is signed or unsigned. It is a free service, so we are receiving a lot of response from both independent record labels who want the opportunity of new exposure for their artists, and we're receiving responses from unsigned, independent artists who want to connect with the community and be seen by record labels."

In addition to exposure for the winners on the CraveFest website, prizes will be awarded at the ceremony. Plans are to release a compilation DVD consisting of the top participants.

The CraveFest website also features entertainment industry news and spotlights established talent. A recent piece showcased American musician and actor Donny Wahlberg, formerly of New Kids on the Block.

Tickets to CraveFest at the Revival Bar cost $10, while tickets to the awards night are $25. For more information or to buy tickets, visit www.cravefest.com, www.ticketbreak.com or call 905-660-3110.

ISRAEL MUSEUM BEGINS MASSIVE RENEWAL PROJECT

Although the Israel Museum of Jerusalem has launched a comprehensive $80-million (US) renewal project, it remains open throughout the construction period with a full schedule of exhibitions and public events.

The most comprehensive initiative undertaken since the museum opened in 1965, the multi-year project will create new entrance facilities, a relocated main entrance hall with access to all of the museum's curatorial wings, reorganized and expanded galleries, and newly centralized temporary exhibition space.

Some 80,000 square feet of new construction will be added, and 200,000 square feet of gallery space will be renewed and expanded, largely within the museum's existing 500,000-square-foot architectural envelope.

The museum is also working to renew the Bronfman Archaeology Wing, planned to provide a narrative timeline of the archeological history of the ancient Land of Israel. The construction is scheduled to be completed in 2010.

Meanwhile, ongoing and upcoming exhibitions include:

- "Surrealism and Beyond," on view through Aug. 15 in the Weisbord Exhibition Pavilion, showcasing 215 works by such artists as Salvador Dali, Marcel Duchamp, Max Ernst, René Magritte, Joan Miró and Man Ray.
- The Shrine of the Book and Model of Second Temple Period Jerusalem Complex presents an extremely rare Hebrew biblical manuscript from the seventh to eighth centuries CE, on display for the first time. A fragment of the Book of Exodus, the Song of the Sea manuscript comes from the "silent era," a period from which very few Hebrew biblical manuscripts survive.
- "Hidden Cities," a new exhibition by artist Yemima Ergas, is on view at the museum's Ticho House in downtown Jerusalem; and the exhibition "Beliefs and Believers: Ancient Art from the Israel Museum," showcases 34 treasures from the museum's archeology wing, and is on display at the Rockefeller Museum in east Jerusalem, which operates under the aegis of the Israel Museum.

Tel Aviv Art Museum Expanding: A major Tel Aviv cultural institution, the Tel Aviv Museum of Art, is also undergoing major change with the recent commencement of construction of a $45-million (US) addition. Nearly 200,000 square feet in size, the Herta and Paul Amir Building will nearly double the museum's exhibition space and is expected to be completed in 2009, in conjunction with the 100th anniversary of Tel Aviv's founding.

El Al Winter Vacation Packages: El Al Israel Airlines is continuing its air and hotel specials to Israel for the upcoming winter season. From Sept. 1 to Dec.15, El Al's winter special features air and five nights free hotel, starting at a fare of $1,229 per person, based on double occupancy at the Dan Panorama hotels.

The airline is also offering a selection of land packages throughout Israel with flexible length of stays, allowing combinations of cities and hotels. Optional value-added services on offer include insurance with RBC, car rentals with Hertz Israel, and mobile phone rentals with Amigo. www.elal.co.il/

A Taste of Israel: Rosie Schwartz, well-known Toronto food authority and journalist, hosts a culinary trip to Israel filled with restaurant dining, cooking classes, wine tastings and meetings with winemakers, relaxing at spas, shopping at colourful markets and sightseeing.

The tour has been specially created by Schwartz, K. Walsh travel consultant Brian Stein, and Amiel Tours of Tel Aviv. Israeli wine experts Daniel Rogov and Jonathan Livny are on board as well. It is geared for both men and women, first-timers and repeat visitors to Israel, Christians and Jews alike. It commences in Israel on March 10, 2008. High Season for Tourists: Canadian tourist numbers to Israel are soaring, according to the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto. June, July and August are traditionally the busiest months of the year for tourism to Israel. Many hotels are running at nearly full capacity but hotel rooms may still be found.

Visitors are discovering that Israel offers other options for accommodation including B&Bs (bed and breakfasts), kibbutz guest houses, zimmer/country inns, hostels and even hospices. Travellers are urged to book as early as possible. For help in planning your visit to Israel, visit the website www.go-israel.com or phone 416-964-3784.

Jerusalem Rocks!: An extraordinary lineup of musical artists has been arranged for Jerusalem Rocks!, a non-profit international music festival set for Jerusalem's Teddy Kollek Stadium on Sept. 9. More than a concert, the event is being billed as a cultural extravaganza celebrating freedom of expression and promoting Jerusalem as a beacon of peace.

Headlining the event are the Black Eyed Peas, whose lead vocalist, Fergie, has sold millions of copies of her solo debut album, The Dutchess. The Grammy award-winning band Arrested Development is also on the bill, along with a mix of local and international acts. For more information, please visit the website, www. jerusalemrocks.com.

Youth Orchestra conductor brings Israeli flair

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The National Youth Orchestra of Canada is in the middle of its annual concert tour, under the baton of Israeli Yoav Talmi.

The orchestra annually holds auditions across the country for a four-week training camp and concert performance series, which runs this year from July 25 to Aug. 8. Each season, the orchestra hires a different guest conductor.

"These are young people with a lot of eagerness to do their best and to learn," said Talmi, conductor for the 2007 season.

"They have tremendous enthusiasm during the performance, to give, not 100, but 105 per cent of themselves. And so this compensates a lot for the lack of experience and for a bit of nervousness."

This year, the not-for-profit organization's orchestra is made up of 92 members, the youngest 15 years old and the oldest, 28.

Talmi said he is proud of the youths' performance at their opening concert in London, Ont., where they gave two encores.

"The level of playing was extremely high," he said, "all the sophistication, the soft places, the many nuances, the shades – all of these things that only highly professional orchestras are able to bring about."

Yoav Talmi, 2007 conductor of the National Youth Orchestra of Canada

The concert series has two different programs, and Talmi said this is a smart way to let youth tackle a large range of pieces.

Talmi said he loves working with youth because of their capacity to learn and absorb. In the two weeks that he worked with the orchestra prior to the first show, he said, he noted their progress every day.

"With professionals, the progress is in inches. Here, it's by miles."

"They start, of course, at a much lower level, but then they are able to progress so much every day – it's very rewarding."

Talmi has served as artistic director and conductor of the Quebec Symphony Orchestra for the last eight years. He has conducted, guest conducted and recorded pieces worldwide, and worked with numerous orchestras, both professional and youth.

He divides his time between Quebec, guest conducting internationally and Israel, where he and his wife, Er'ella, live in Kfar Saba.

The two were born on kibbutzim in the north of Israel and met in the army, as both played for the Israel army band. Er'ella retired two years ago from her career as a flutist. The couple has two grown children, Gil and Dana.

"I never relinquished the feeling that Israel is [our] main home… We feel strongly that we will go to there and come from there."

The National Youth Orchestra of Canada's tour has three concert dates in Quebec on Aug. 4, 5 and 6, before a final concert at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall on Aug. 8.

"It's awesome and invigorating to have new people in the band," Zimbel said. "Fan response has been great, and we are extremely proud of our show and our record. Our goal is to promote this project, tour locally for 18 months, build a fan base and then move on to another project."

Onward! is an exhilarating way to spend an hour. From the melodic energy and distinctive groove of To a Tee – my favourite track and the song with which I believe the album should have opened – to the hauntingly beautiful and gentle Gabriel's Wish, which showcases both the versatile Aaron Davis on keyboards, and John Johnson's sexy saxophone, Onward! is a musical journey on which I have been led willingly and repeatedly since the concert.

Talented composer and bassist Heilig has captured the soul of the city in the rhythmic and smooth GO Train, while Deep Dish, a homage to the pie at Toronto's Pilot Tavern, is full of sassy energy. With each listen, I discover more nuances in the music and continue to be amazed by the intensity and character of this album.

As for the band members, well, Zimbel doesn't have the curly black "big hair" he did in the '80s, nor does Heilig (thankfully) sport a mullet, but drummer Charlie Cooley and Latin percussionist Art Avolos – both heartthrobs in Manteca's heyday – don't seem to have aged.

Perhaps it is the energy and vitality of their music that has kept Manteca captivating and youthful or perhaps it is their own excitement in being back together, recording and performing again. Whatever it is, at the concert I felt transported back to my late teens when I was a "groupie," and I recalled some of my best memories of that time – spent with friends at concerts or listening to the band's albums on my Walkman.

Manteca's music always uplifted my spirit. Happily, Onward! continues that tradition.

Filmmaker's documentaries make people feel less isolated

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Mirror mirror on the wall, am I lovable at all? Why can't attractive, intelligent, single women meet Mr. Right and seal the deal?

These are questions Alan Zweig tries to answer in his recent documentary Lovable (2007), which he wrote and directed. He also appeared in it, as he did in his two previous films, using an angled mirror so that he could photograph and "interview" himself.

The offbeat filmmaker had no difficulty finding women to tell their tales for the movie, produced by Primitive Entertainment.

"Most people want to open up. I'm not expecting anything huge – I'm like their friend. When they tell their story, it can be powerful," said Zweig at an outdoor patio in Forest Hill Village.

Drawing from dating services and newsletters, the director, who is in his mid-50s, lined up his subjects.

While some he considered had little to say, those he chose had plenty. "Only the best made the cut," he said.

"Why is a nice, pretty, smart girl like you not married?" Zweig asks one eligible woman in the film.

Her answer: "Nobody asked me."

"Do you think you're doing something wrong?"

The attractive single in her 30s replies, "Maybe, but I don't know what that is. What is it? I need someone to tell me… Maybe I want it [marriage] too much."

"What are you doing about [finding a husband]?" they ask.

Some friends offer advice: "You have to pretend not to care and as soon as you stop caring, you'll find Mr. Right."

Zweig, who is also baffled as to why he hasn't met his match, offers a male perspective.

Talking candidly to his mirror, which plays a role in all his documentaries, Zweig reflects on stories of his loves and losses.

When he considers, "Am I lovable… why am I single?" he finds there's no simple answer.

Some people tie the knot, he concludes. Others don't.

Zweig believes this film, like his others, serves a purpose: "They make people feel less alone, less strange and less isolated."

Asked about Lovable's success – it aired on TVO and Showcase Television – Zweig attributes it to the film's universal theme.

But success hasn't always come easy.

At 19, he tried his hand at writing, filming and editing a flick his friend was shooting at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue.

He enjoyed the experience so much that he decided to attend film school after finishing university.

"At Sheridan, I made a short, impressionistic film about driving cabs, and another, The Boys, about friends hanging out one night, who had no girlfriends."

Alan Zweig interviews himself in Loveable.

Unfortunately, it went nowhere.

After years of wondering how to succeed, Zweig discovered the key.

"A friend was making a film with a High 8 camera. I had never shot with a High 8 before, so I got one right away. It meant I could actually make a film."

Although he did not intend to be a documentary filmmaker, he fell into doc mode with Vinyl in 2000.

A compulsive record collector, Zweig sought and received a grant to make a narrative about himself and other record collectors. It was the turning point in his career.

"The success of Vinyl took a huge weight off my shoulders," he said.

The film also became the first in a trilogy of first-person documentaries that chronicle the filmmaker's journey of discovery.

In Vinyl, Zweig takes a candid look at people who compulsively collect things – like almost every record ever made, thousands upon thousands stacked to the ceiling or in boxes they trip over.

"Many collectors told me it was just about the records, but I'd say, 'Come on there has to be more to it.'

"If collecting meant it was only about the music, they might sound less eccentric, more like an art collector, give them a sense of authority and be admired. It bore analysis."

At first, the record buffs thought he was there to see their albums, Zweig said, but when he got to the heart of the matter, "some got upset, but no one threw me out!"

Those featured in Vinyl include award-winning filmmaker Atom Egoyan, Toronto Star arts and media critic Geoff Pevere, pop culture broadcaster Daniel Richler, actor/filmmaker Don McLellar and several musicians and writers.

In Vinyl, Zweig anticipates the theme of Lovable when he contemplates whether record collecting may fill a void in his life, since he doesn't have a wife and kids.

Zweig's second film I, Curmudgeon (2004), which he also directed and wrote and was produced by Primitive, won a Silver Hugo at the Chicago Film Festival. It shines the spotlight on people, like Zweig, who speak their minds.

He worked on I, Curmudgeon without a script, he said, because he didn't want to limit himself.

"Filmmakers put restrictions on themselves and if they don't reach those points, it's harder to succeed."

Instead he chose to trust himself and his editor, Chris Donaldson, who works with him in close collaboration.

With no limit to his offbeat topics in I, Curmudgeon, Zweig said he ended up interviewing more men than women. "While women are more socialized, men are more overtly outspoken."

Zweig said he enjoyed interviewing people for I, Curmudgeon. "It was like meeting my brothers."

He feels comfortable around those who don't sugar-coat things but prefer to question life rather than mindlessly following the crowd, he said, attributing this to his Jewish upbringing "that doesn't celebrate things when it's not called for."

For example, he said, "When my mother would ask, 'How's the brisket?' My dad would reply, 'I'm eating it, aren't I?'"

That's the way the world is, he concluded. There's no need to say something is good each time.

Not revealing what his next film is about, Zweig did say it has nothing to do with his personal life, and he won't appear on camera.

A troubling look at postwar Poland

Fear: Anti-Semitism in Poland After Auschwitz* by Jan T. Gross, Random House

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

It's been nearly two decades since the Soviet Union's postwar rule in Poland came to an end. Most visitors to Warsaw today find what they would call a normal country.

The outskirts of the city centre, where reconstruction after the war was slightest, are now dotted with sleek, postmodern skyscrapers. With its inclusion in the European Union, Poland, and Polish society, has been recognized as forward-looking, economically sound and western-oriented.

But for Jewish visitors, there are notable ironies inherent in this normality. On the fringes of what was the German-orchestrated Jewish Ghetto, one can sit in the breezy, high-ceilinged atrium of a Westin Hotel and look out at a street corner where sewer grates provided ghetto fighters with a last-moment escape route. The less lavish but still comfortable Holiday Inn on Zlota Street is a few steps from one of the few remnants of the Ghetto wall and the site of Janusz Korczak's wartime orphanage.

To add to the list of Varsovian paradoxes, across Zlota is a sparkling, many-tiered mall – designed by none other than Daniel Libeskind – that's filled with international retailers.

Poland's contemporary success – its apparent normality – is undercut by a recent book by historian Jan Gross entitled Fear: Anti-Semitism in Poland After Auschwitz. Gross is well known in both Poland and North America for his previous book, Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland.

Both a cause celebre and a source of scandal in Poland, the Jedwabne book describes the killing of 1,600 Jews by Poles in 1941. Fear provides this event with further context and interpretation, by setting it in the background of what Gross depicts as the overwhelmingly violent atmosphere that Jewish survivors found in postwar Poland.

With Fear, Gross provides his readers with what he calls an "essay in historical interpretation," which makes use of Communist Party documents and police records, alongside recent Polish historiography that has begun to confront the absence of attention to these themes, which existed well into the 1990s.

Fear, then, makes for grim but arresting reading. Its centrepiece is a detailed discussion of the events leading up to, including, and following the substantial pogrom that took place in Kielce in early July 1946. Like many anti-Jewish assaults after the war, the instigation of events in Kielce included a blood libel accusation. A child who had travelled without permission to his old home "because he liked the cherries grown by a farmer" there, was reported to have been assaulted by Jews.

His father's drunken appearance at the local police station included the accusation that Jews had made use of his son's blood. In Poland, after the war, the traditional libel included a newly imagined canard: survivors, it was said, returning from their incarceration in the camps, used the blood of Christian children for transfusions.

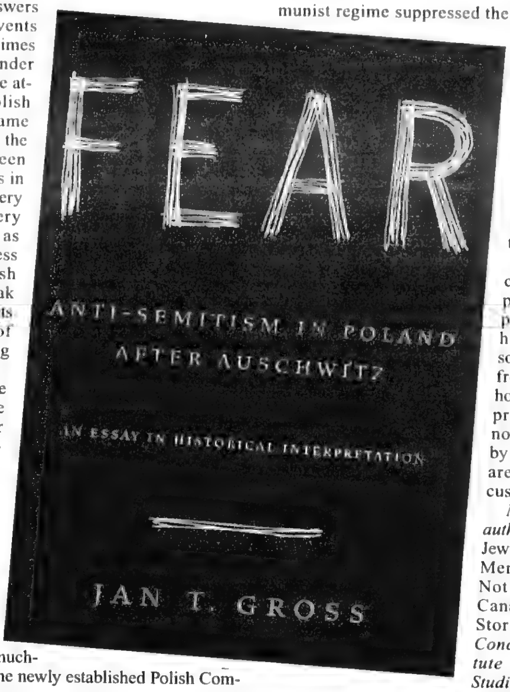
What followed was a days-long melee, in which police and security personnel aided the crowds in pulling Jewish men, women and children from their homes and from trains, killing them in the open street, on railway platforms and in the woods.

Gross effectively conveys how these events, though by far the worst to take place after the war, were in many ways emblematic of the dangers that awaited returning Jews.

But why? Gross finds the answer more difficult to outline than the grim details of assaults, incendiary actions by militia, and neglect, if not collusion by the nascent Polish Communist government.

Gross looks for answers at the heart of the events Poles witnessed, sometimes as accomplices, under German occupation. He attributes to postwar Polish society a sense of shame and guilt with regard to the massacres that had been carried out by Germans in all of their towns, on every main road, and in every major city. He points as well to the unwillingness of almost all Polish Catholic clergy to speak publicly against these acts and the involvement of Poles in plundering Jewish property.

Gross highlights the unusual actions of one man, Bishop Teodor Kubina of the key pilgrimage town, Czestochowa, who spoke unequivocally against the use of the blood libel in order to excuse complicity and looting (Kubina was later sanctioned by the Church hierarchy for his efforts).



FEAR
ANTI-SEMITISM IN POLAND AFTER AUSCHWITZ
AN ESSAY IN HISTORICAL INTERPRETATION
JAN T. GROSS

Fear also provides a much-needed account of how the newly established Polish Communist regime suppressed the necessary response and discussion of anti-Semitic abuses. The Communists, Gross argues, recognized the popular influence of anti-Semitic sentiments and did not see their own cause furthered by confronting views that were, in some circles, a rallying cry of Polish nationalism.

Gross aims to draw connections between the postwar years and present-day Poland, but his argument remains somewhat shadowy on this front. His book suggests, however indirectly, that the present post-Communist normality is haunted still by events and silences that are in need of honest discussion

Canada wins bronze in Jewish hockey World Cup

By PAUL SHINDMAN
Special to The CJN

METULLA — Team Canada beat France 4-1 to win the bronze medal at the first-ever World Cup of Jewish Hockey at the Canada Center on Israel's northern border.

Still jet-lagged and adjusting their game, Canada's national Jewish ice hockey team fell 2-1 to their Israeli hosts in a hard-fought game on the first day of the four-nation World Jewish Ice Hockey Tournament, which began July 15.

Two days later, the Americans beat Canada 7-5, but the team came back to soundly defeat France 10-4 to finish the preliminary round-robin with a 1-2 record.

Despite having had no exhibition games to prepare, Canadian coach Sherrie Bassin was blunt.

"There was no excuse. We got beat fair and square on the scoreboard," Bassin said.

The U.S. team took the gold medal by downing Israel 2-1 in the final.

Canada and Israel battle it out in the opening game of the Jewish World Cup of Hockey.

The tournament was put together by Montreal's Alan Maislin, who is chairman of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel. Three years ago, Maislin brought in his close friend Jean Perron, who led the Montreal Canadiens to a Stanley Cup in 1985, to coach the Israeli team.

Perron's Israeli squad looked sharp all week, and it had the advantage of being both on home ice and being the only team that had played together before the tournament.

"The challenge was there for us. We had a great game, so people were happy, my players were happy and the fans were happy," Perron told The CJN. "I looked at the rosters from Canada and the U.S. and I knew on paper that the U.S. had the better club."

Perron said he was surprised that Canada only got the bronze. "I guess they were shocked in the first game when we beat them 2-1."

The tournament was covered in the Israeli media, with the sports TV channel sending a crew to do a special report.

"The publicity that Israeli hockey got was tremendous, and it's going to help hockey in Israel like you can't believe," Perron said.

Despite their depth of talent, the Canadians hadn't played together as a team before their opening game, and they faced the hot-handed veteran Evgeny Gusin between the pipes for the Israelis.

The game was almost called as heavy fog settled over the ice just before the scheduled 8 p.m. faceoff. At one point, you couldn't see from the blue line to the goal.

However, the fog cleared an hour later and play was intense from the outset. Israel's Alon Eizenman scored first in the second period, as both teams had chances. In the third, Canada was pressing on a power play when Israel's Itzik Levy blocked a slapshot from the point. The puck ricocheted down the ice and Levy put it past Canada's Andrew Braithwaite for a 2-0 lead.

With less than two minutes on the clock and Canada on the power play, Shane Urowitz finally notched a goal for Canada, who outshot Israel 37-30 for the game, but came up short on the scoreboard.

Canadian backup goalie Jessie Britstone from Toronto said it was his first time in Israel since his bar mitzvah in 1990.

Even though Metulla and the north were under rocket attack by Hezbollah last summer, he was excited to be there.

"My parents are so proud of me, it's fantastic. They're not worried. We're just here to play hockey, enjoy Israel and have some fun, and you can't be concerned about things you can't control. My parents couldn't be happier."

Other players were cheered on by family who came with them.

Honey and Milton Mandel from Toronto were on their 12th trip to Israel to watch their grandson, forward Daniel Mandel, and were accompanied by Daniel's brothers and parents.

Team France was a surprise, with a squad of talented players led by the Rozenthal brothers, who play for France's national squad, and coached by Canadian Dave Henderson, who also coaches the French national team.

The Americans also had a Canadian connection, with former Toronto Maple Leaf star John Anderson behind the bench.

Anderson coaches the AHL Chicago Wolves and jumped when asked to coach the American Jewish all-star team.

"I said, 'Sure, I'd love to come to Israel,' because it's a place that I think you should see," Anderson said. "Can you imagine that I have a chance to coach hockey and come over and visit a great country – you can't miss that opportunity."

Bassin, one of Canada's all-time top junior coaches, said it was his first time in Israel, where he also has relatives.

"As a matter of fact, I should have been here a long time ago," Bassin admitted. "We're not just Canadians, we're Jewish Canadians, and it's just like coming home here."

Sometimes, change is good

Sandie Benitah
20Something

A friend of mine recently brought to my attention a book titled Who Moved My Cheese by Spencer Johnson. It talks about change and how we're all so darn afraid of it.

I don't know about you, but usually, I don't change anything in my life until I no longer have a choice, or until someone takes charge and changes it for me.

It's an awful way to live, but it's an awfully comfortable way to live. Now, I want to be the one who changes.

Changing a job, a career, a boyfriend or a girlfriend at this point in our lives – when the how-to book on being twentysomething says it's all supposed to be figured out by now – isn't an easy thing to do. But I'm sure no matter how hard it is to change, it will be even harder to do 10 years down the road, when life has become hardened by a decade of comfortable routine.

Change is particularly hard right now, because we are in the midst of making decisions that are supposed to be permanent fixtures in our future.

I have a friend who has been with her boyfriend for almost 10 years, but she's starting to doubt if he's the right person for her future.

"I'm 27. I can't be alone and start all over now!" she said when I asked her about the possibility of making a change.

"OK then," I said, raising my eyebrows.

But in truth, I totally get her.

These years are boxing us in into a cage of insecurity. Thirty is our deadline: we all want to get married and be settled by then, with a fabulous career and a clear path pointing us to where we are heading.

Each passing year means time is running out, which means now is certainly not a time for drastic changes.

But when is it ever a good time to risk something?

Recently, I've been thinking a lot about making a career change. I don't know what I want to do or how I'm going to do it, but I'd like to be brave enough to jump right into it without thinking twice.

Now might be a bad time to make a move. I don't know if I'll be good at something new and I really hate the fact that once again, I'll be starting at the bottom of the ladder of success after finally moving up a few rungs at my current job.

It's not as if I have a ton of savings to fall back on, either.

There's a lot to lose, that's for sure, but I can't help but think that if I don't maked the change, I'd be losing out on something much more precious – a life.

What is life about – and I think this applies at any age – if we don't test ourselves?

We often equal change with instability, but it shouldn't be that way.

If we look back at the times when change has been shoved down our throats against our will, what would we find?

Recently, I was told that Hashem doesn't throw anything our way that he knows we can't handle. I guess I believe that, but even more so, I'd like to think that change comes our way to make us realize what we're made of.

Don't fool yourself. Change can be ridiculously tough and even unbearable. But the remarkable thing is, we always find a way to make it work for us.

Sure, we can always choose the comfort of our routine and avoid the headache and heartache altogether, but for me, there's nothing more heartbreaking than living a life that you've simply settled for.

BEET & GOAT CHEESE SALAD W/PISTACHIOS

2 tins canned beets, sliced in 1/4's
1/4 cup oil
1/4 cup minced green onion
2 tblsp fresh lemon juice
3/4 tsp salt
1/4 tsp black pepper
4 oz goat cheese
3 tblsp salted shelled WHITE pistachios coarsely chopped
4 cup Boston or other soft lettuce

Mix green onion, lemon juice, salt, and pepper in a small bowl; whisk in oil. Drizzle dressing on lettuce and toss to coat. Crumble goat cheese on top, then add beets. Scatter with pistachios.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

David and I have been married for six years. For the first few years of our marriage, we were both travelling and setting up our careers. Now that we are both established in that part of our lives, we are planning to expand our family. However, for us, that is easier said than done.

We have been trying unsuccessfully to have a baby for two years, and it's been a very difficult time for us. What makes it worse is when one of our friends or family members says something like, "Don't you think it's time for kids?" Our personal lives seem to be open for discussion by our in-laws, friends and extended family. No one seems to mind their own business. Each time one of them says something about us having kids, it opens up fresh wounds.

The stress is becoming incredibly hard to deal with, and I may end up blowing up at the next person who mentions it to me. Any suggestions?

Ready to Blow

Dear Ready to Blow

Infertility is a growing issue. When things don't go as planned, it's not only stressful, but you are treading in unfamiliar waters. There are many difficult emotions, questions, decisions, etc. Every month becomes a waiting game, and emotions and hopes peak and plunge over and over again. The last thing you need to deal with is outside stimuli from "well-meaning" friends and family. The most innocent question can cut like a knife. Whether you and David choose to share your situation is a very personal decision, but it's one you should discuss and decide on together.

If you decide to share your situation with others, it doesn't mean the questions will stop. They might simply change from, "When are you having kids?" to "So how's it going?"-type questions.

Either way, you have to learn to deal with it. You can't control what others say, but you can try to stop the comments. An answer such as, "When we decide to have a child, we'll be sure to let you know" may sound a little sarcastic, but it will do the job without a long painful explanation.

Whatever the two of you decide, be comfortable with it. Enjoy each other and follow your own plan of action. Together you will make the right decisions for your family.

Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Strumming on his guitar, singing his hit song Boker Tel-Aviv, Israeli, Haran Yaffe, 25, delighted the crowd with his passion and talent on a peaceful and joyous June evening that was one of many wonderful events recently sponsored by Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada.

One year ago, however, all was not well for Haran and the many Israeli soldiers who were fighting for their lives in Lebanon.

Haran was part of a delegation of 10 disabled Israeli war veterans who visited Toronto for two weeks in June. Every year for the past 29 years, members of the Toronto Jewish community have opened their hearts and homes to host these remarkable war heroes, each of whom has a story that is equally riveting and heart-wrenching.

Living in Toronto, removed from the horrible and immediate impact of war, we tend to focus on the fatalities of war and often forget the casualties of war, those soldiers or Israeli citizens who have actually survived terrorist bombings or combat. We assume that the survivors are rescued and on their way to recovery. Of course, it is another thing to listen first-hand to the personal stories of rescue and rehabilitation.

Although each story is often gruesome and gory, it's the concealed emotional damage that will pose the greatest challenge for these injured soldiers. After spending time chatting with many of these incredible young men, I soon realized that it's what you don't see that hurts the most.

Often, many people will say of the disabled war veterans, "Well, they don't even look injured".

Most, if not all of the vets who visited Toronto this year suffer from post-traumatic distress syndrome. It's heartbreaking to hear how their war experiences have affected them one year later, 10 years later or often for life.

Asaf Ashkenazy, 30, a gentle, soft-spoken Israeli, describes how a splatter of ketchup on his two-year-old son's face will send him back to Bet Lid in 1995, when at the age of 19, only four months into his army service, he had to collect bodies after a double suicide bombing. Asaf is still unable to work, but finds solace in working with stained glass at a local club run by Beit Halochem.

Yaffe was in critical condition for two months in Rambam Hospital after being trapped in a tank that was attacked in Lebanon last year. Haran is now waiting for a risky 15-hour surgery that will repair the muscles in his stomach. He jokes about looking pregnant, but coping with his new appearance and disabilities is inevitably difficult and trying.

Josef (Yossi) Haddad, an Arab Israeli Christian, volunteered for the Israeli army, because Israel is also "his country" and he felt it was the right thing to do.

He, too, was injured in Lebanon.

At first glance, when you meet Yossi, all you see is a bright, funny handsome guy who happens to have a scar running across his face.

Emotionally, however, Yossi is dealing with the loss of most of his unit, his "brothers" as he calls them.

For almost a year, he did not want to sleep alone. On this visit, Yossi fell asleep on a bus en route to Ottawa. While Yossi napped, he dreamed that he was back in Lebanon in combat. When he awoke, Yossi was so disturbed that the local paramedics needed to be called in to calm him down.

Unfortunately, there are too many such stories to retell. The situations may be different, but the emotional trauma for those that are injured is long-lasting.

The Beit Halochem centres in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and Nahariya, and one that's soon to be completed in Be'er Sheva, help men and women, young and old, cope with their injuries and provide support for a comprehensive healing process.

KRINOS TASTE OF THE DANFORTH
FRIDAY AUG. 10 — SUNDAY AUG. 12

ALL IN GREEKTOWN, YOURS TO ENJOY!

Discover A New "Taste" at Krinos Taste Of The Danforth

Toronto's favourite street festival has a whole new way to celebrate the fun and flavours of Greece and summer in the city.

As last year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth festival came to a close, a poll released by Decima showed that 90 per cent of respondents identified Taste as their favorite GTA festival event — beating out the Toronto International Film Festival, Caribana and Pride Week from an audience perspective.

Everyone gets to be Greek for the day

"The seed for this festival was planted 14 years ago when local businesses were looking for a way to attract attention to the community; there were only a few tables of food and some local musicians," says Alex Alexakis, Krinos Vice President of Canadian Operations. "Now it's the largest Greek festival outside of Greece, attracting over one million visitors from around the world."

The GTA lays claim to more than 200,000 residents of Greek ancestry, the third largest Hellenic community outside Greece and between August 10 and 12, 2007, everyone who comes to the Danforth gets to be Greek for the day.

This year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth has loads of new features and activities to engage and entertain the entire family:

- The Celebrity Stage, presented by the Toronto Star, will include demonstrations by Citytv's CityLine chef and celebrity restaurateur, Michael Bonacini, PLUS a performance by Kevin Brauch, the hugely popular host of the shows "Thirsty Traveler" and "Iron Chef America," where he will perform stunts such as Sabretage — slashing open a bottle of champagne with a chef's saber while blindfolded.
- The Celebrity Stage at the new Taste will also offer a taste of Broadway — with live performances from the cast of We Will Rock You and Second City. In addition, visitors will be treated to live musical performances by Frank D'Angelo & The Steelback 2-4 —and much more.
- The Greek Stage will feature traditional Greek dancers (such as Troupe Naditu, Levendia X and Arabesque) and musicians (such as Exodos, Parea, Galaxy and the Yianis Kapoulas Band).
- The Sports Zone will include events created by each of Toronto's professional sports teams. There is a Maple Leafs' Slap Shot Machine, a Raptors' interactive basketball court, a Toronto FC kicking station and soccer zone where you can actually play a game, the Argos Football Toss, Toronto Blue Jays pitching and batting cages, a Toronto Rock lacrosse shooting game (plus meet your favourite Rock players), the Toronto Marlies goal-tending skills game, two volleyball courts (one for adults and one for children) – and much more. Lots more chances for people to test their skills and win fun prizes!
- The Olympiada, presented by the Toronto Star, will include Pythagoras' Chess Challenge (a life-size chess game), a climbing wall hosted by 'Outward Bound,' the Medusa area with a live reptile show, and Greek pottery hosted by 'The Clay Room' where children of all ages will have an opportunity to paint their own pottery using Greek themes.
- The D'Angelo Pavilion will feature the fantastic feats of The Zero Gravity Circus' Amazing Aerial Acrobats.
- And to cool off, visitors can bring their skates to the 'Blades of Glory,' an immense street-wide ice rink on the Danforth where they can skate and take in special appearances.

This year, the Greek Wine Pavilion featured at the Krinos Taste of the Danforth will be dramatically different from the past. It will be a sensual food and wine tasting garden, featuring the talent of local chefs, sommeliers and celebrities. Guests will be able to sit down, savour, learn about, and purchase the highlighted wines of Greece.

Food, drink, entertainment, sports, games and much more

They will also be able to attend some fascinating seminars in the Greek Wine Garden, including:

- A Wine "Taste Off" – Greece vs. the World;
- A "Taste" Of The Food & Wine Regions of Greece;
- A "Taste" of Sommelier.

They will also have the opportunity to sample some culinary classics that are exclusive to the Danforth.

The 2006 Krinos Taste of the Danforth welcomed over million people and organizers are expecting record crowds again in 2007. Full details on this year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth can be found at toronto.com/TasteOfTheDanforth

- On Friday, August 10, celebrities, politicians, members of the media and corporations will be kicking up their heels with beds on wheels at the 3rd annual Danforth Dash bed race in support of Toronto East General Hospital (TEGH) Foundation.
- To date, this event has raised over $100,000 towards the purchase of new electric hospital beds for TEGH.
- This year, funds are being directed to the expansion of the Emergency Department at TEGH.
- Once again, the Danforth Dash will be held in conjunction with the launch of the Krinos Taste of the Danforth on Fri., August 10, from 1 pm to 3 pm.

HELPING TO SAVE LIVES

On an annual basis, the Toronto East General Hospital registers over 200,000 patient visits, delivers 3,200 babies and responds to over 60,000 emergency visits. Recently, TEGH became the fastest GTA adult hospital for transferring patients from ambulance to hospital emergency care.

In addition to supporting the Danforth Dash, the Krinos Taste of the Danforth has donated (to date) upwards of $850,000 to Toronto East General Hospital.

Sun Valley more than brand names

If you value quality, hate spending hours schlepping through giant faceless supermarkets, and need more than the corner grocery store can offer, Sun Valley Fine Foods is tailor-made for you.

Larger than the typical neighbourhood European food store, yet small enough to navigate your way through quickly, Sun Valley is boutique food shopping at its very finest. Just about every sought-after brand name is here, from gourmet grocery items to breads, cakes and pastries. The produce is spectacular; the meat, fish and poultry are perfection itself.

But Sun Valley is more than just brand names and quality. It's about finding exactly what you need for your family and special occasion dining with efficient, friendly personal service.

It's these attributes which keep customers coming back — not only the locals, but shoppers from North York, Thornhill, and even Richmond Hill, often armed with the temperature-controlled bags that have become standard equipment among shoppers willing to go the extra mile for the very best.

People come from outside GreekTown to shop Sun Valley "for the same reasons they patronize the restaurants," says partner Spiro Aravantinos: "quality, freshness, flavour, and value."

Ah yes, value. What Aravantinos doesn't mention — but what's obvious from a quick tour of Sun Valley — is that they've resisted "snob appeal". In true GreekTown spirit, they've kept their prices affordable even as their reputation has continued to grow.

The bottom line is that under this one roof you'll find exactly what you want in less time — yet at a more leisurely pace — than in the "big box" supermarkets. And, if you're a husband who'se been "commissioned" to bring home the groceries, your chances of getting a glowing report card on arrival are better here than just about anywhere else.

The reason is simple: Sun Valley just doesn't sell anything that won't get the spousal seal of approval — no matter how hard that may be to come by in your household.

Home cooking lives at Kalyvia

Think of the best home-cooked meals you've ever tasted. Probably they were (or still are) your mother's. Maybe your grandmother's. Sitting down at that dinner table was one of the most pleasurable experiences you've ever had.

That's the kind of homemade taste you can expect at Kalyvia, served up in gargantuan portions worthy of any doting mother.

This is particularly true of the combination platters (poikilias) of seafood and meat, priced from $25.95, which are so big you need a road map just to get around them. Teeming with a variety of Greek specialties, these platters are more than just food ... they're a symbol of the bountiful GreekTown dining experience.

If you're a fish and seafood lover, you can cut your travel time to Greece by about 14 hours. Try the garides (shrimps sauteed in white wine sauce) or the salmon steaks topped with Kalyvia's own homemade lemon sauce, which also garnishes the broiled Red Snapper. Like everything else at Kalyvia, all the dips and sauces are made fresh daily from scratch.

How much better does this taste than prepared food? It's like comparing your mother's cooking to fast food: no comparison.

Founders Mike and Peter Tsafatinos are both from the Greek town of Kalyvia; when you name your restaurant after your home town, you've got a culinary legacy to live up to. These lofty standards for quality and freshness have earned Kalyvia a four-star rating from Toronto by Night Journal.

While Kalyvia's cuisine is authentically Greek, it's a family place that caters to appetites of all ages. Kalyvia's Makaronada (Greek-style spaghetti), available in a variety of entrées and as a side alternative to rice or potatoes, will appeal to the kids, and it's a fun way to introduce them to Greek cuisine.

The Tsafatinos' sons Jim and Jim, and a host of other family members, ensure that each and every dish emerges from the kitchen brimming with the homemade taste their customers expect.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

For Astoria, the future of Greek dining is now

If there's one word that's synonymous with "GreekTown On The Danforth", it's "Astoria." For well over 30 years, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Building on and enhancing the Astoria brand

Astoria's recent major renovation has seen it emerge brighter and roomier than ever, without losing any of its intimacy. If it shone before, now it positively sparkles. A nouveau rustic take on traditional Greek motifs unfurls in rich golds and maroons, with elegant tile underfoot and soaring sky blue overhead.

Company Director Peter Kerasiotis undertook the renovation with a view to embracing the needs and tastes of a new generation of diners while remaining mindful of Astoria's long-standing clientele. "Many of our original guests are still regulars three decades later," he notes. "They rely on us for their family outings and special occasions, and it's their loyalty that has allowed us to grow. We took our time renovating our original location and building our new location in Mississauga because we wanted to ensure a seamless transition. The idea was to build on and enhance the Astoria brand, not dilute it. That is something our customers would never have accepted. They expect satisfaction, and we intend to give it to them."

The feedback has been overwhelmingly positive, says Kerasiotis. The essentials — freshness, quality, and friendly personal service — are still unfailingly apparent at both locations. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Astoria was also rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite grilled sea bass and salmon steaks — and Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

"Best of the City"

Toronto Life

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location and dual outdoor patios (still the Danforth's largest, and now among its brightest as well!)

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that its continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to GreekTown" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pan: as close as it gets to a sure thing

Question: Which restaurant combines old-world standards of culinary excellence in a quaint, boutique-like interior with an atmosphere intimate enough for candlelight dinners and the glow of a fireplace, yet casual enough for a quick bite? Big enough for your family events, yet small enough to cozy up in? Run by two generations with a passion for service that is GreekTown itself?

If you guessed Pan On The Danforth, then you either have excellent taste in Mediterranean food or you recognized Chris and Soula Christodolou (right) – probably both.

Judged "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants by no less an authority than Toronto Life, Pan doesn't just serve Mediterranean food; it brings it to life. Lamb isn't just lamb; beef isn't just beef. Poultry is off the charts. Case in point? The Jumbo Quail. There's no forsaking chicken – especially with Pan's acclaimed Santorini on the menu – but Pan's rendition of quail will expand your gastronomic horizons. Stuffed with mushroom and shallots, served with new mini potatoes and a vegetable medley, and finished with pearl onion in a dark roast chicken red wine reduction, it's one of a handful of signature dishes that have elevated Pan to the status of restaurant "Superstardom." Just don't mention that to Chris or Soula.

"We never try to be 'bigger' than anyone else," says Chris. "The moment you think you've got it made, that's when your service starts to slip." Despite a sterling reputation built on decades of experience, the Christodolous "come to work every day like it's our first day on the job. There is no other way. We never take anything for granted."

They may not, but you can. You can take it for granted that at Pan, your palate will be sensitized to the nuances of Mediterranean cuisine. You can take it for granted that you'll be served like family, by family. You can take it for granted that you'll be greeted with a smile that says "We love to cook for you."

There are no guarantees in life, but insofar as great dining experiences are concerned, Pan is as close as it gets to a sure thing.

Pantheon: 10 years of excellence

In 10 short years, Pantheon has established an Olympian standard of excellence in GreekTown.

How does one carve a new culinary niche in an area already blessed with dozens of fine Greek restaurants? By serving food so fresh and brimming with flavour, you'd swear it was your own mother who'd cooked it. Just don't tell executive Chef Nick Paroussis; he never "fishes" for compliments. Just fish.

And what fish! So extensive is the selection – and so impeccable the preparation – that the name "Pantheon" has become synonymous with superb fish and seafood, not only in GreekTown but Toronto-wide.

Here, you'll find all the popular varieties you've come to expect in GreekTown – like red snapper, Atlantic salmon and sea bass – plus many other exotic selections you'd be hard-pressed to find elsewhere. Baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies are imported directly from Greece. Striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others are music to a fish lover's ear. At Pantheon, you could dine on a different fresh fish every day for a fortnight without exhausting the possibilities.

Paroussis' partner John Troupis and his son Bobby Troupis understand that food is not merely sustenance, but art and soul. In that spirit, they do their utmost to ensure that each customer's visit is a sensory experience. Attesting to their success is the ongoing popularity that has allowed Pantheon to double in size since it opened. It now offers two bright, spacious dining rooms. Semi-private dining with a comforting fireplace is available in the east room.

In a business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon's continuity stands out. The same head chef and most of the same wait staff present when it opened are still in place. Clearly, people like working here, they like the clientele, and the clientele likes them. Continuity breeds loyalty, and vice versa.

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. The Olympics happen every four years, but at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown, you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts, surprisingly low prices and the freshest fish this side of Greece. Our ship has come in.

Danforth-goers, in festive spirits at the Krinos Taste Of The Danforth, can look forward to more food, drink, fashion, entertainment and fun at this year's event

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

So simple, yet so refined. So sweet, yet so subtle. So much a part of growing up and, as we age, a timeless reminder of the simple pleasures of youth.

Among the foods ubiquitous in Western culture — crossing all age groups and ethnicities — jam ranks right up there with butter. Many of us were practically reared on peanut butter and jam sandwiches, both as a lunchtime staple and anytime snack. For some, toast without jam is unthinkable. Afternoon tea without fruit preserves to slather on our biscuits and scones? Unfathomable.

Enter Crofter's, a manufacturer with an old-world penchant for homemade goodness and a new-age commitment to health and the environment. In their state-of-the-art plant in Parry Sound, Ontario, Crofter's turns nature's fanciest, freshest hand-picked fruit into pure gold in a bottle.

Even to call Crofter's a manufacturer, however, is to somehow diminish their boutiquey attention to detail and quality. One half expects to turn a corner and find Mom hard at work, hand-bottling each jar.

It takes all of two seconds to taste the Crofter's difference. Nothing in life is perfect, but in the realm of jam, jelly, or "fruit spreads", as Crofter's calls them, this is close. Not too tart, not too sweet, fairly bursting with flavour, they bring out the best in everything they cover — bread, crackers, and scones — even a dab on Bubie's sponge cake, when she's not looking. At holiday time, they'll elevate your already-famous hamantashen and sufganiot to legendary status.

There's a very practical reason for Crofter's superior taste and "fruit spread" moniker: more fruit. While conventional manufacturers often label their products "more fruit", "double fruit", and so on, that simply means more than or double the fruit in their own or other conventional products, which often contain scads of refined sugar and very little actual fruit. When Crofter's says "Fruit spread", they mean Fruit Spread — in a bevy of mouthwatering flavours.

Add to this exquisite natural taste the double comfort zone of certified organic production and C.O.R. supervision, and you have a gem of a product. Yet Crofter's jams are generally priced lower than competitive organic brands and, in some cases, even lower than conventional, non-organic brands.

Sold at better health food stores like The Big Carrot and in the health food section of selected supermarkets and specialty food stores, Crofter's fruit spreads are pure gold in a bottle.

COR 398 www.crofter'sorganic.com

Big Carrot's major expansion means 40 percent more to love

When The Big Carrot expanded in 2002 by leasing space across the courtyard for its dispensary, customers smiled. When it grew again in 2004 by annexing an adjacent retail space, those same customers grinned even wider. Now they're positively giddy. Why? Because the latest expansion has seen The Big Carrot's floor space grow by a full 40%. Metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living now offers you 40% more to enjoy.

Natural, Organic, GMO-free, Kosher-certified products

In practical terms, the expansion means larger produce and bulk departments featuring new, state-of-the-art dispensers; more cash desks; and three express lanes to ease congestion at the checkouts. The store entrance has wider automatic doors. There is a new separate nutritionist area for private consultation. The body-care department is spacious and sunny and offers an expanded variety of rejuvenating products. The vegetarian deli has more seating and the meat department has been upgraded. The fridge and freezer department have also been expanded to meet the ongoing demand for more frozen natural convenience foods. With the newly extended hours, you also have more time to enjoy the experience.

The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. It has also demonstrated its environmental friendliness by heating its newly renovated juice bar entirely from solar panels.

Run as a worker owned co-op, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

The Big Carrot's well-versed staff can help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher-certified — or a combination thereof. The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher-certified products include Crofter's Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Cold Mountain Miso; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; Kemach Organic Spelt Matzah; Amy's soups, pizzas and frozen entrées; Sol Cuisine falafel patties; Healthy Times baby foods; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods. If you're a Strub's pickle lover — who isn't? — their organic variety is out of this world.

The Big Carrot carries a tremendous variety of healthy desserts and sweets. Beit-Yitzhak jams are Kosher and made in Israel. Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups are popular mainstays, as are Bob's Red Mill packaged grains, cereals and baking goods; the Big Carrot stocks both in abundance.

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold. From the Organic Lentil Daal to the Organic Couscous Salad, every item is a taste and visual treat. It also offers a selection of sinfully delicious desserts without the sin, since they're free of refined ingredients.

Solar panels power 100% organic juice bar

The Big Carrot's juice bar is the only one in Toronto that's 100% organic. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats.

Among the sandwiches, try the Grilled Tempeh, lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo. Fresh, delicious and wholesome — just as Nature intended.

For a summer treat, enjoy Mapleton's organic ice cream, as well as Cool Hemp, a Kosher-certified, organic non-dairy dessert available in a cup or wholesome organic cone.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

Water bar or fashion show? The Water Shoppe is both, bubbling over with 37 varieties from the world over — and counting

"Plashes and plays alone the deserted pool;
As those, is free, who think themselves unseen.
He rolls in his heap of fruit,
He slides his belly over
The melonrinds of water, curved and smooth and green."

— Lone Bather, by A.M. Klein

Lisa Gnat and Tracy Robert may not have been reading Klein when they envisioned The WaterShoppe, but the array of colours and shapes they've assembled is, to the effusive joy and sensuous aura of water, a visual tribute worthy of Klein's poetic homage.

Lisa Gnat and Tracy Robert: when fashion and water meet, it's beautiful

Is it a glass works, with esoteric shapes in all colours of the rainbow — or is it a WaterShoppe bubbling over with the silvery sustenance of mountain springs the world over? It's both — and much more.

The idea was hatched three years ago, when Gnat — then and still the co-owner of Kick Maternity in Forest Hill, and Robert, her friend and partner in the WaterShoppe — saw a window of opportunity. A window with an ocean view.

"We both loved water, not only for drinking, but in all its forms and modes. It's mystical. It's magical. It's the life force, and it's an art form unto itself," says Gnat. Continues Robert, "We went out and bought every bottle of water we could lay our hands on. When we brought them home to sample them, we were blown away by the visual effect of the light reflecting off the different-coloured bottles."

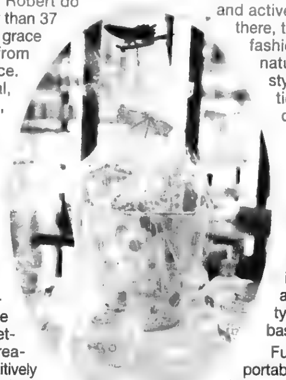
From childlike fascination came adult inspiration. "Restaurants, bars and cafés spend millions creating an environment that entices you to enjoy your meal or beverage. We decided to put water on the same pedestal. The fact that it's good for you isn't enough. It has to be sexy."

How sexy?

"As sexy as coffee," coos Robert. "Everyone loves to go for coffee and complain about their self-indulgence afterwards. Here you can have your cake and eat it too. Water's a natural high, and it's the best thing for your skin. Just ask any top model what she drinks."

Italian soda bar offers KSA Kosher syrups in 14 flavours

Row upon shimmering row of bottles regale you as you enter, some basking in the sunlight, others glimmering in the shade, all containing liquid beneficence from the four corners of the planet. Leading fashion stores boast of "shopping the world over" for their clients; Gnat and Robert do this for water. No fewer than 37 varieties (and counting) grace their shelves. Water from Italy. Water from Greece. Water from Portugal, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Germany, France, Belgium, Canada, and a host of other countries. Israel's on their "get list". Any country where pure, fresh water flows, it seems, is represented here, in bottles of bright, cheery, festive colours and shapes. Eighty percent of those bottles are glass, not just for aesthetics but also for health reasons. And priced competitively with conventional stores, though you won't find even half their variety elsewhere.



And if you think all bottled waters are created equal, think again. As Gnat and Robert quickly learned, the differences are manifold. Different pH levels. Different mineral content. Natural spring water vs. artesian water vs. glacial water. Large bubbles vs. small bubbles.

But man cannot live on water alone; he needs snow cones. Mindful of that, Gnat and Robert purchased a state-of-the-art machine to churn out a frozen base for 14 fabulously flavoured premium KSA Kosher liqueurs. Top up at the Italian soda bar with your favourite effervescent H_20, and you have a summer beverage that flat-out rocks.

Sequestered behind the bevy of bottles is a big-screen display showing movies themed on — you guessed it — water. 20,000 Leagues Under The Sea — The Adventures of Nemo — if it's water-based, you'll catch it here. Kids love it, just as you'll love the lounge at the rear of the store where you can kick back and relax with some glacial runoff in a glass.

That's no mere play on words, by the way; The WaterShoppe sells 10 Thousand BC® glacier water which, according to the supplier's literature, "is not filtered through the ground where dissolved solids and underground pollutants can attach to each water molecule. This premium glacier water has a total dissolved solids (TDS) of 4 parts per million — naturally. A reading that makes it the world's purest natural bottled water." No less an authority than Dr. Charles Mayo of the Mayo Clinic noted that "The only minerals the body can utilize are organic. All other types of minerals are foreign substances to the body and must be eliminated."

After sampling these pristine waters, turning on my kitchen tap feels like walking down a dark alley.

For Gnat, whose late father Albert was a co-founder of the Ikea store in Netanya and active in philanthropic circles there, the segue from maternity fashion to water is perfectly natural. "Fashion is about style, colour, and presentation. Water is about style, colour, and health. When they meet, it's beautiful."

Gift baskets are a big item here, as are water-by-the-case sales. As you'd expect, the gift baskets are spectacular, and they're the kind you can rip open and dive into without worrying about the sugar intake typical of conventional gift baskets.

Future plans include portable water stations for Bar/Bat Mitzvahs and other special events, allowing Gnat and Robert to take their water show on the road.

In the few short weeks since the store opened, the response has been incredible, says Robert — from public and trade alike. A leading supplier of water purification systems who happened by told her and Gnat how gratified he was to find someone who finally spoke his language.

We've all heard or read that drinking eight glasses of water a day promotes optimal health. The WaterShoppe's making a big splash by turning that duty into a pleasure.

Avli: food as it was meant to taste

You long for a restaurant that serves food in its original, unaltered, pristine state. Chicken that tastes like chicken. Lamb that tastes like lamb. Beef that tastes like beef. Seasoned, to be sure; but in a delicate, understated manner that gently enhances its intrinsic flavour.

AVLI
restaurant
401 Danforth Avenue • 416-461-9577
www.avlirestaurant.com

The answer to your gustatory search is short and sweet: Avli.

Internationally renowned for his culinary exploits over a 35-year career, owner / chef Lambrinos Vassiliou nevertheless downplays his role in the magic that emanates from his kitchen.

"There are no big secrets", he grins. "We buy the best quality ingredients — no additives, no preservatives. No matter the season, no matter the cost. I don't "add" taste. It is already there, in the food. I just let it out."

Underscoring its commitment to this philosophy, Avli is one of the few, if not the only, Greek restaurants in Toronto to offer an organic chicken entrée. Served with potatoes and salad in two sizes, it's favourably priced even in comparison with conventional chicken entrées. Lambrinos shrugs. "I'm not an accountant. I serve the best food I can, and let my customers be the judge."

Avli's menu is dotted with gourmet twists on traditional Greek specialties. Among the salads, try the Haloumi (arugula, tomato, and grilled Haloumi cheese with a mint vinaigrette). Among the entrées, the Kokoras Graviera (chicken and Gruyère cheese) is the quintessential Cretan taste experience.

Avli's dips, world-famous for freshness and flavour, will engage you for a good long while until your entrée arrives, but the comfort zone of knowing it's being prepared from scratch justifies the wait.

If you're looking for a unique, GreekTown-defining dish, look no further than Avli's entrée pies. More than any other single item, these have forged Avli's reputation. Available in four varieties — Chicken Mushroom Rosemary, Seafood Feta Tomato, Rabbit and Pearl Onion, and Lamb, each is a work of art, served in a hand-made, olive oil crust. You're just as inclined to frame it as to eat it, but once you break its marvellously flaky crust, you'll experience a confluence of aroma, texture and taste that is indescribably compelling.

521 a winning # for chilling on Danforth

Too often in our fast-paced lives, we find ourselves racing to and from dinner. 521 Café & Bar has taken a stand against that mindset by encouraging dinner-goers to warm up to dinner, or wind down after it, with a relaxing beverage.

Just because it entices you to stop and smell the roses, however, doesn't mean 521 is slow-paced. It's a high-energy environment, always busy and abuzz with animated conversation. A wide range of international music is paced according to the clientele's energy level and mood.

This L-shaped gem occupies one of the Danforth's choicest corner locations, at Fenwick just west of Carlaw. Two separate patios — the smaller in front, the larger, more private one at rear — usher you into 521's boldly elegant interior. Original canvases of charcoal and burnt orange adorn the steel-gray walls. Slate-gray leather bench seating with polished oak backing spans the café's entire length, facing the mirrored bar.

First-rate scotches, martinis and speciality mixed beverages are 521's stock in trade. In particular, the 3 oz. martinis put to shame those of many high-profile downtown haunts. The specialty coffees and frappés are also first rate. Spanish coffee, Irish coffee, Monte Cristo — 521 delivers all with full strength and flavour.

Though it's a café first and foremost, 521 also offers delicious light meals, and prices across the board are very reasonable. For example, you can enjoy a lovely mixed garden salad with a hot pressed grilled sandwich for only $5.95. Plentiful cheese platters served with fruit or meat are also specialties, and there's a variety of fresh desserts.

Brothers Lambros and Frank Babatsikos grew up in GreekTown and have been active in Danforth restaurants for most of their adult lives. In 521 they've succeeded in creating an environment distinctively different from any other in Toronto. "We'd like to make 521 as famous an address as Saul Korman has made 569," grins Lambros.

So if this finds you heading down to the Danforth for dinner, why not budget another hour or two and turn a relaxing dinner into a very relaxing evening? This hot spot will give you 521 good reasons to chill out.

Select Bakery evokes childhood memories

A bakery is not merely a place where bread is made. It's a symbol of sustenance that evokes treasured memories of still-warm goodies emerging from the oven with a maternal blessing and simultaneous admonishment not to overindulge.

Nowhere is this symbol better exemplified — and brought to life on a grand scale — than at Select Bakery. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), its majestic array of baked bounty is to the palate, what surround sound is to the ear. Enhancing its seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.

Select BAKERY
DELI • PATISSERIE • CAFE
405 Donlands Ave. 416.421.2400
info@selectbakery.ca

The Katsamakis family — father Emmanuel, sons Kosta and Nick, and daughter Areti — lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktoboureko, petits fours et al) is complemented by exceptional European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

Exquisite wedding and other special occasion cakes

For weddings and other events, Select's special occasion cakes score a 10 out of 10 for artistic merit. If a cake could be said to belong in the Louvre, it was likely conceived in their oven.

Further distinguishing Select is its prepared foods. No time to cook? Moussaka, pastitsio, and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are prepared fresh daily for your dining pleasure. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

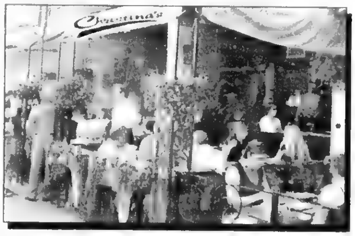
But we digress from the baked temptations. Among the highlights at Select are:

- European Village Bread: crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside;
- Kalamata Olive Bread: as good as it sounds. Buy two;
- Chocolate-covered baklava: a hybrid pioneered by Select, it picks up where "to die for" leaves off;
- Mille feuilles: Select's version makes a good run at the proverbial thousand sheets, each one shatteringly good.

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group.

Christina's: star quality on every level

For truly authentic, upscale Greek cuisine, live entertainment and star quality, no restaurant shines as brightly as the effervescent Christina's. Though it continues to move with the times, with its sprightly updated decor, sparkling new menu, and year-round heated patio, Christina's has remained the hub of GreekTown activity by relying on a time-honoured formula: fresh, homemade Greek recipes, prepared lovingly, one meal at a time.



Christina's
On The Danforth
492 Danforth at Logan
416-463-4418 christinas.ca

Two other things that haven't changed are Christina's friendly service and its magnetic appeal to the silver screen set. If that really is Robert De Niro seated next to you — or Bette Midler, or Jim Carey — it doesn't necessarily mean that you're on camera. It simply means that they share your good taste in Greek cuisine.

The portions are spectacular, the preparation refined. There's a difference between being full and being fully satisfied; Christina's chefs grasp this distinction across the full spectrum of the menu, hence Christina's continuing popularity among young and old alike.

Christina's is ideally suited for intimate private functions such as Bar / Bat Mitzvah parties, graduations, birthdays, and sweet 16s, and does a brisk business in special event catering.

If you're a lamb lover, Christina's leg of lamb, rack of lamb, and lamb chops are legendary. Other delights include Stuffed Chicken Breast, Mediterranean Seafood Platter, Moussaka (both traditional and vegetarian), and tender Kalamari, both grilled and fried. Hearty combination platters featuring your favourite dips, meat, and seafood items go down smoothly with a glass of ouzo or wine from Christina's vast Greek and international selection. Fish and seafood are delivered fresh daily, so ask for the catch of the day when you're reviewing the menu.

With Christina's increasingly popular weekend continental brunch, you can experience GreekTown at a slower, more relaxed pace.

Live entertainment on weekends includes belly dancing and a two-piece (bouzouki and guitar) Greek band playing a blend of old and modern Greek tunes. There's nothing like a rendering of Never On Sunday or Zorba The Greek to tug at your heartstrings and whet your Greek appetite.

And just wait until De Niro gets home and tells his family that he was sitting right next to you...

"a cheery place ... great respect for the food they serve ... Christina's has fulfilled its promise"

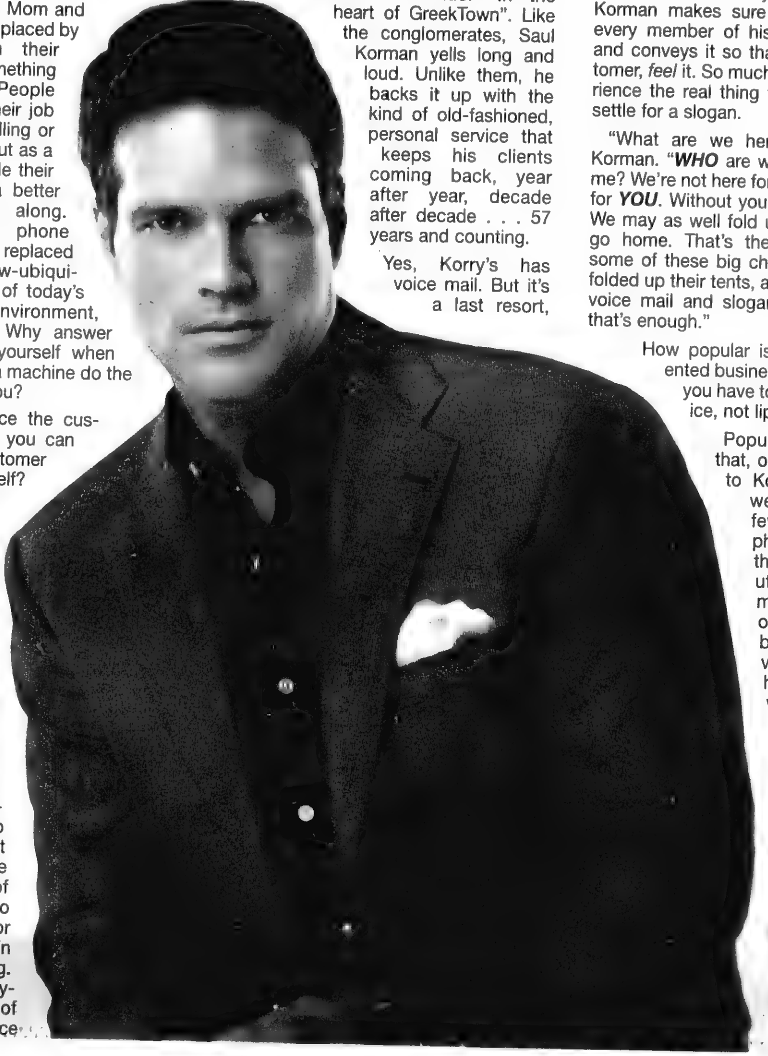
Service.

It's the most overworked word in today's business lexicon — and the most *under*worked act.

Back in the day — before e-mail, before voice mail — service wasn't talked about much, because you didn't need to talk about it. It was a given, inextricably woven into the fabric of daily business. And not only in the small stores; even the department stores greeted you with a personal touch.

Slowly but surely — almost imperceptibly, over decades — service began to erode. As Mom and Pop shops gave way to conglomerates, Mom and Pop were replaced by people on their way to something "better". People who saw their job not as a calling or parnosse, but as a place to bide their time until a better gig came along. Personable phone service was replaced by the now-ubiquitous staple of today's business environment, voice mail. Why answer the phone yourself when you can let a machine do the talking for you?

Why service the customer when you can have the customer service himself?



But customers aren't stupid. As they began to rebel against this impersonal treatment, the marketing geniuses who drive many of today's business strategies came up with a brilliant idea: promote the idea of service to make up for the shortfall in the real thing. Remind everybody, 24/7, of the great service they're getting. On websites, on brochures, on company letterhead. Service, service, service. Commitment to our customers, commitment to our customers, commitment to our customers.

Real service or lip service?

Only one problem. Marketing campaigns are supposed to promote service, not replace it.

Amid this decline and fall, however, we are happy to report that real service is alive and well and living at 569 Danforth Avenue. "In the heart of GreekTown". Like the conglomerates, Saul Korman yells long and loud. Unlike them, he backs it up with the kind of old-fashioned, personal service that keeps his clients coming back, year after year, decade after decade . . . 57 years and counting.

Yes, Korry's has voice mail. But it's a last resort, not a first option. If you call Korry's and no one picks up the phone, it's either because all hands are on deck serving customers or because the store is closed. No other reason. And when your call is answered, you're greeted with a cheery "Thank you for calling Korry's" — spoken by someone who really means it.

"You'd damn well better mean it," barks Korman. The dean of GreekTown and the patriarch of Korry's, Korman not only talks the talk, he walks the walk. Because when you genuinely want to serve — when your heart is really in it — you'll be right there for your clients. Here, the customer really is King, and Korman makes sure that each and every member of his staff knows it and conveys it so that you, the customer, feel it. So much better to experience the real thing than to have to settle for a slogan.

"What are we here for?" snaps Korman. "WHO are we here for? For me? We're not here for me, we're here for YOU. Without you, we're nothing. We may as well fold up our tent and go home. That's the problem with some of these big chains: they have folded up their tents, and left you with voice mail and slogans. They figure that's enough."

How popular is a service-oriented business that believes you have to give real service, not lip service?

Popular enough that, on a recent visit to Korman's office, we counted no fewer than 23 phones calls in the first 10 minutes. While many business owners hide behind their voice mail — hell, some wouldn't be caught within miles of a phone — Korman scrambles to personally answer every call, deferring to an employee only when the mile-a-minute barrage becomes too much to handle.

A growing and thriving business is a just reward for 57 years of dedicated service, but in February of this year, Fashion North, Canada's national menswear trade show, went one better by presenting Korman with the inaugural Retailer Of The Year Award. Said Joseph Nunziati, President of Fashion North, "The board felt it was important to recognize the contribution of a retailer who not only was respected by his peers in the industry, but had gone to extraordinary lengths to become the voice of our industry to Canadians. After polling retailers and designers in

That the award was voted on by his peers speaks volumes about Korman's reputation in the menswear industry. Those he's worked with, kibbitzed with and sparred with rose as one to acknowledge the man of the hour, recognizing not only a lifetime of hard work and dedication to his craft, but his tireless promotion of the menswear trade in general. One percent inspiration and 99 percent perspiration? It sounds corny, but it's true.

RY'S
h Avenue

In accepting the honour, Korman was his usual gracious self. Among many others, he thanked Kevin Frankish of CITY-TV for "finally wearing a jacket."

Here is a brief sampling of the tributes paid to Korman (names have been omitted to protect the guilty):

- "You are the heartbeat of our industry."
- "Saul once said to me...I would give you a purchase order if you were better looking and I wasn't drunk."
- "Saul has been in love with the same woman for 50 years. If Myrna [his wife] finds out who that woman is, she'll kill him."

In an era when it's often hard to find a salesperson to talk to, Korman gives you an earful — even when you don't ask. Tune in to virtually any radio station in the GTA, and he's there, telling you what's new at 569 Danforth. The Boss, the Canali, the restaurants, the cafés, the ambience...all in the heart of GreekTown. He's all talk and all action. Just ask his staff. If you're on your game — greeting customers with a smile, servicing them with your heart, he's your best friend. If you're not — if you're looking to string together a few coffee breaks and call it a workday — he's your worst nightmare.

It's a formula that clearly works, for, 57 years after hanging up his shingle, Korry's is not only still going strong, it's growing. "Business has never been better," he crows. His 18 handpicked employees ("my Chai crew", he winks) service you to the nth degree. How can you not come back?

"Why are we here?" reiterates Korman. "It all comes back to that. If you have to chase after someone to give them your money, why bother? Be there for your customer, before the sale, during the sale, and after the sale. Be there for him when he needs you."

"If you have to chase after someone, why bother?"

The whole world, it seems, has congregated on the sales floor of Korry's, at this moment fairly bursting at the seams with customers, tradespeople, and staff, all looking for a piece of the action. Korman, tack-sharp and on his game, is loving every minute of it. Come Taste Of The Danforth, that whole world will grow and multiply, filling GreekTown with revelry. Will you eat more souvlaki and drink more ouzo than you should? Maybe. Will there be an Elvis sighting? Probably. Will he be updating his wardrobe at Korry's? Definitely. Because, in the King's inimitable words, "There's a whole lotta service goin' on" at 569 Danforth Avenue.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Toronto's finest sushi experience

How does Toronto's best sushi experience get even better? Via a major renovation that's turned its already pleasant interior into a visual feast.

The new look is a cutting-edge collage of milky white tones on steely black and gray, interspersed with yellow gold. The east wall is flanked by a long bench with facing table seating, the west wall by sumptuous booths. Sculpted wall ornamentation adds depth and dimension on both sides. At rear, set off from the main dining area, is a small grouping of tables for quieter, more intimate dining – though at no time can Sushi Delight be described as "noisy". It's a quiet, restful, peaceful place.

Sushi Delight may sport a new look, but there's no mistaking the exquisite taste that has redefined Toronto's sushi landscape. How they manage to offer so much for so little – all the while spending a considerable sum in beautifying the premises – is nothing short of amazing. Nowhere else in Toronto can you get such variety and presentation at such reasonable prices. So extensive is the menu, in fact – 207 selections plus party trays – that you'd have to take a year off to read it cover to cover. Failing that, here are a few highlights:

- Salmon Love Boat: 20 pc. for $15.55 or 30 pc. for $18.55;
- All-day combos in bento box, from the exquisitely detailed Vegetarian Box for the ridiculously low price of $7.50 to the gargantuan Fuji Box for $13.95;
- Beautifully presented cold and hot Party Trays from $33.95 to $57.95.

Though a handful of Sushi restaurants now dot the Danforth, Sushi Delight was the first to open in the heart of GreekTown, where others feared to tread. Several have followed, but none have duplicated the combination of great taste, superb selection, and impeccable service that have made this wonderfully intimate spot a haven for Toronto sushi lovers from Day 1.

Heavenly home cooking at Zorba's

More and more, we seem to measure restaurants by their ability to simulate "home cooking", and a big part of GreekTown's appeal is that so many of its dining establishments achieve this goal. But if ever a restaurant could be said to welcome you into its home and sit you down at its kitchen table, that restaurant is Zorba's.

Your first clue is that the decor, while cheerful, is neither trendy nor obtrusive. Tastewise, however, Zorba's katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking) will spoil you as few restaurants can. Always off the menu and priced from $8.50 to $12.00 for a mammoth portion complete with potatoes, rice and vegetables, katsarola makes it doubly easy to forget you're "eating out".

Each day, owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos slaves over three to five of these specialties and spoons them into the steam vessels at front. And, just as you'd expect in a home environment, what he cooks depends entirely on his whims of the day. Typically roasted or stewed, these dishes won't just remind you of home; they are home.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once they're gone, they're gone, and with an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, you're advised to arrive early for best selection.

Remember your Mom's or your Bubbie's chicken fricassee? Zorba's lamb fricassee will melt in your mouth just as hers did. Lamb with oriso, a rice-like pasta, is equally heavenly, as is the beef stew. These preparations generally feature green beans, cauliflower, zucchini, or okra, often in combination, gently oven-simmered in a light tomato sauce. Vegetarian specialties include roasted gigantes (lima beans), a local favourite.

Zorba's mainstream menu tends toward casual, and many entrées are offered in three sizes (small, regular and large). The medium Greek salad could easily pass for a large; the large is off the charts. As with the katsarola, the prices are exceptionally modest. For example, the Lamb Souvlaki is offered as a sandwich for $4.75, with fries for $6.25 or with salad for $7.45.

Since Zorba's defines itself by its home cooking, it's only fitting that multiple family members be present. Try seven. At any given time, you'll find Kosta, wife Christine, sons Bobby, Anesty and Spiro, and daughters Demetra and Maria minding the store. The attitude is warm and friendly, the affection genuine, both between family members and with customers. Says Bobby, "We don't really know where home life ends and the business begins; they've become one and the same."

If you've never had the pleasure of dining in a Greek home, a visit to Zorba's will quickly fill that void in your life experience.

Danforth Jewish Circle: building community values

Some eight years ago, a handful of interested parents met in Debbie Plested's living room and decided to start a Jewish studies program in the Riverdale area.

They were all members of the newly formed Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a grassroots, liberal egalitarian congregation in Toronto's east end, established in 1996 and then chaired by Marlee Wyman.

Giving children a sense of community

At the time, Plested, co-chair of the DJC education committee, said children's education was a priority for many DJC members.

"We were really a community," she recently said. "We wanted our kids to learn and study within our community and feel a part of the community."

Plested said the group recognized the necessity of setting up a program that could meet the diverse educational needs of the children.

At that time, the local Hebrew heritage program, a school board program that had been operating in the neighbourhood for some 15 years, could only offer a basic introduction to Jewish studies, she said.

"The program was instrumental in creating a sense of Jewish identity and a sense of community," she said. "But [it] had trouble developing as a curriculum because it had to cater to a wide age group. What was happening was that our families had no choice but to look outside the community to further their child's Jewish education."

The group of parents met many times in the course of the year to establish a community-based supplementary school. They had to develop a curriculum, hire teachers and publicize the program to attract students, find funding and find a space to hold classes, Plested said.

Now in its 11th year, the DJC Children's Jewish Studies program runs weekly classes for elementary school students out of a local school. Through discussion, debate, music, drama and art, the children study Hebrew, Torah, Jewish history and current events, Jewish holidays and rituals, Plested said.

"Our program values Judaism as a dynamic, living religion. Our students learn to understand what it means to be a Jew and how being Jewish affects our values, beliefs and behaviour."

While the exploration of Jewish identity is a key component of the curriculum, Plested said that given the high proportion of interfaith families, there is also an emphasis on "respect for the broad spectrum of multiculturalism which exists within Judaism and in the neighbourhood."

The goal of the Hebrew language program is to help the children learn to read Hebrew, recite the basic prayers and gain familiarity with Hebrew songs, she said.

"We want the children to be able to decode Hebrew so that they'll be able to prepare for their Bat or Bar Mitzvah…If they have more of an interest in conversational Hebrew, we encourage and assist them [with] supplementing their studies by connecting them with a tutor."

B'Nai Mitzvah program: building and bonding

In addition to the school, the DJC offers a B'nai Mitzvah program, which is run by parents and not funded by any group. "This group is the beginning of a connection to the community for the future because the kids are building friendships and bonding as a group," Wyman said.

Wyman said she marvels at the growth of the community education program. "It shows you what a group of dedicated volunteers can accomplish. They're incredibly motivated. That's the whole thing about volunteerism: action is taken because we want to see results."

Sher-E-Punjab: new flavour frontiers

Those who enjoy the pleasures of Northern Indian cuisine know Sher-E-Punjab not only a haven of culinary pleasure, but as a salve to the soul.

It's indisputably Toronto's pre-eminent restaurant in its class, yet it's so much more than food. You may be stressed. You may be rushed. You may have places to go and things to do. But the moment you enter this enclave of tranquility, your troubles fade away. You can literally feel the weight of the world slipping from your shoulders — and you haven't even opened the menu yet.

SHER-E-PUNJAB RESTAURANT
351 Danforth Avenue
West of Chester subway
416-465-2125

Earth shades of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — set a peaceful tone. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajastan, adorn butternut-yellow walls. You're greeted with quiet dignity by Amar, Malkit or Jaspal Singh, or by a member of their courteous wait staff.

There's no running here. No shouting. Just Shalom.

If you enjoy bread with your meal, you'll have to resist the temptation to over-order. Sher-E's Naan is the standard by which others are measured. Hand-made on the premises, it's baked fresh on demand — every 15 minutes or so at busy times — in a huge Tandoori clay oven.

For mainstream tastes, the Tandoori chicken is first-rate, but there are many other options worth exploring. A few suggestions:

- Chicken Tikka Masala. Boneless chicken is marinated and barbequed with green peppers and onions in a delicious aromatic curry;
- Lamb Saag. A distinctively different way to enjoy lamb in GreekTown. Mild chunks of boneless lamb are gently simmered in a spinach purée;
- Shahi Kofta. Vegetable balls in a mild sauce. Sounds deceptively simple; tastes divine.

Sher-E-Punjab, in fact, has long been a preferred destination of vegetarians. Even something as simple as cauliflower and potatoes (Aloo Gobi) takes on unexpected subtlety in Sher-E-Punjab's kitchen.

And, of course, there's the timeless favourite — lentil soup. If you're party to the ongoing debate as to who serves the best lentil soup in Toronto, one visit to 351 Danforth Avenue will settle it once and for all. Case closed.

Lentil soup debate?
What debate?

After 34 years, the Sher-E-Punjab experience is as fresh and uplifting as the hand-blended spices that flavour its dishes.

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

MESSINI
AUTHENTIC
445 DANFORTH
416-778-4861
WWW.MESSINI.CA

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

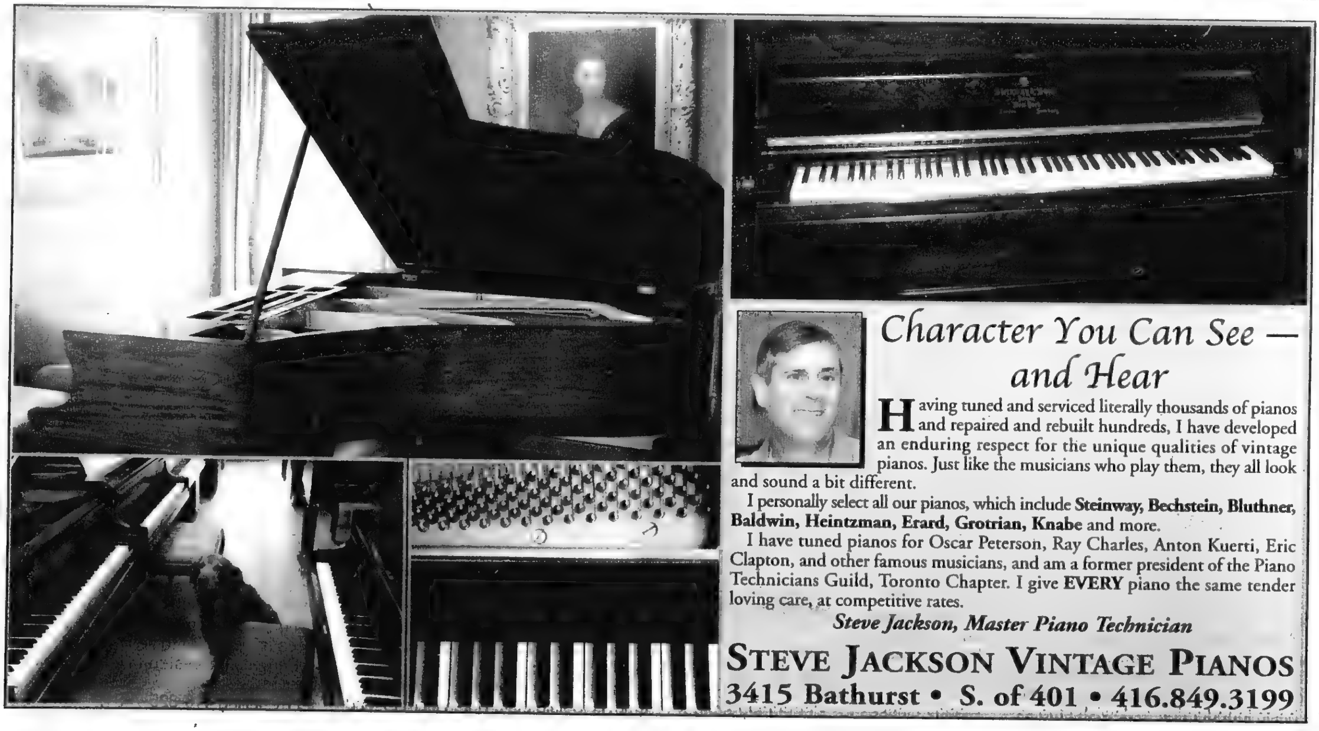
- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee' ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $8.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.



Character You Can See — and Hear

Having tuned and serviced literally thousands of pianos and repaired and rebuilt hundreds, I have developed an enduring respect for the unique qualities of vintage pianos. Just like the musicians who play them, they all look and sound a bit different.

I personally select all our pianos, which include Steinway, Bechstein, Bluthner, Baldwin, Heintzman, Erard, Grotrian, Knabe and more.

I have tuned pianos for Oscar Peterson, Ray Charles, Anton Kuerti, Eric Clapton, and other famous musicians, and am a former president of the Piano Technicians Guild, Toronto Chapter. I give EVERY piano the same tender loving care, at competitive rates.

NOT A STAR OF DAVID, BUT...The Leaside bridge connecting Millwood Avenue with Pape and Donlands — leading directly into GreekTown On The Danforth — recently underwent major repairs and reconstruction, complete with new parapets. Purely by coincidence, the motif embossed on the parapets, designed to resemble the original tile pattern dating back to 1927 when the bridge first opened, is pleasingly reminiscent of a Magen David.

Discover a new taste at The Taste!

People's most precious possession is time. With shrinking amounts of leisure time available and increased options, we know that we have to keep the Krinos Taste Of The Danforth Festival "fresh".

The Krinos "Taste" is already Toronto's most popular festival, according to a Decima Research poll, so the challenge is a daunting one. Our theme this year is "Discover A New Taste". For our new "Taste" we have introduced more family-friendly programming, as well as expanding on our entertainment alternatives.

One thing that hasn't changed about the Taste is the charitable aspect. The dollars you spend at the Taste help to save lives through the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. It always feels good to enjoy oneself, but when you can help others at the same time, it feels so much better.

If you're an athlete, we have a skating rink — yes, an actual ice skating rink in the middle of August — as well as kids' and adults' volleyball courts.

If you're a sports enthusiast, we have challenges and prizes from every one of Toronto's professional sports teams. We also have an Olympiada, featuring a Climb Mount Olympus Climbing Wall, as well as Pythagoras' Chess Challenge, which will be played on a life-size chess board, among other activities.

If you have a love of entertainment, we have the cast of "We Will Rock You", Second City, as well as D'Angelo's Pavilion, featuring the Zero Gravity Circus.

If you're someone who loves great food and drink, we have the Steelback Beer Gardens, the Bailey's Shiver Zone, and a Greek Wine Garden featuring some fascinating seminars.

We also have Michael Bonacini, the City-Line celebrity chef, as well as Kevin Brauch, host of "The Thirsty Traveler" and "Iron Chef America".

As for food, there is always amazing food from the Danforth restaurants, as well as the Festival's special tasting stations. We hope that you will join us to "Discover A New Taste".

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Plenty to woo your senses

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

A solid community with solid values

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

Dine like royalty...

Others may treat you like royalty; here, you are royalty. Serving you is not our first priority, it's our only priority.

If you haven't yet been to our cozy little kingdom, ask someone who has.

Ask them how they enjoyed our Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki). Perhaps they'll tell you they were so captivated by it, they forgot it was "just" an appetizer.

Ask them if the the Avgolemono soup was delicate enough, or the Greek salad crisp enough.

Ask them if the Lamb Kleftiko's divine combination of lamb, feta, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms wasn't simply the most exquisite thing they'd ever tasted...

... until the Red Snapper arrived at their table. (Ask them if they enjoyed the salt spray on our boat that morning. After all, fresh-caught means fresh-caught).

Ask them if the assortment of homemade desserts they inhaled was truly the crowning glory.

And don't forget to ask them about the incredible birthday party they threw for Moishe in our private party room.

But no need to ask them if you can borrow their crown. Yours is waiting for you at reception.

the PALACE

722 Pape

Ouzeri: Danforth's most relaxed dining

A splash of vibrant colour, sweeping sky-blue awnings, and a festive patio beckon you inside. It's as if you stepped straight off the sidewalk onto the beach. Ouzeri has the unique ability to relax you in seconds — a valuable asset when you consider that the enjoyment of any meal hinges first and foremost on the absence of stress. This is the one GreekTown restaurant that feels like one giant patio. Even when you're seated inside, the open, airy ambience gives you a sense of freedom, of letting go.

500A Danforth Ave. 416.778.0500

Like their pride and joy, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis are bright, cheery, welcoming people whose love of the restaurant business comes naturally, since they grew up in the business.

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ouzeri's eclectic menu is focused on quality, not volume. The kind of quality that will stir your fondest memories of home cooking. Sacrilegious though it sounds, Ouzeri's Avgolemono Soup will have you drawing favourable comparisons with your Bubie's chicken soup — high praise indeed.

Famed for their appetizers, Ouzeri also offers a number of intriguing entrées. Strydia Ouzeri is topped with spinach, tomato, kaseri cheese and Ouzeri's special sauce, then baked to perfection. Lamb rosemary pie, offered in your choice of lamb shank and feta or chicken with a rosemary and mushroom sauce enveloped in filo, is warmly recommended. The moussaka — both meat and vegetarian — is as good as it gets in GreekTown, and the seafood richly deserves the"authentically Greek" label you'll encounter everywhere on the Danforth. Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Salmon, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Ouzeri's extensive Greek wine list has a selection that will perfectly complement any of the entrées, or stand on its own as an after-work or after-dinner libation.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. Like the awnings, they're dressed in an extremely comforting shade of blue.

Whether you're looking for a quick bite or a long, pleasurable meal, Ouzeri's three levels of dining all convey the same gentle message: Relax. Relax. Relax.

Family planning

In GreekTown, you needn't go far to find family. It finds you. Walk into any restaurant, café, or shop, and odds are you'll find yourself in a family business. The old-fashioned kind: not just owned by family, but worked by it. Family out front, greeting the customers. Family serving. Family in the kitchen.

In GreekTown the family business finds you so often, in fact, that you wonder how there's any other kind.

Read or listen to the business news, and you'll learn about the latest corporate takeovers. About the big getting bigger — either on their own steam, or by swallowing up their competition. Or via a merger (a business euphemism for loveless marriage). But who needs love? Who needs a crush on each other when together, you can crush the competition?

But the folks in GreekTown just don't get it. They're stuck in a time warp of love, caring, and customer service. Get bigger? Hell, they're having way too much fun being small.

It gets worse. They're more interested in supporting their neighbours than competing with them. The owners of restaurant A have dinner at restaurant B. Corporate takeovers? They haven't a clue. Loveless marriage? Ditto. Their marriage — their family business union — is so full of love, the whole family feels compelled to share.

Of the businesses featured in this section, virtually all are family businesses, generally run by multiple family members. Father-son. Mother-daughter. Husband-wife. Brother-sister. Uncle-nephew. Aunt-niece. Cousins. In-laws? Elsewhere, pariahs; in GreekTown, family, or oikogeneia (pronounced ee-ko-yen-ya). Everyone pulls the oars together, and the only fish that get swallowed up are the mussels.

This family dynamic works so well, you'd assume it was meticulously planned. And perhaps, in some instances, it is.

In the majority of cases, however, this perfect harmony — plates sailing from kitchen to table like baton passes — just happens. It comes naturally. It comes from younger generations seeing and hearing and feeling the resonance between their elders, and wanting to be part of it.

Nor does it stop there. Because when you work in GreekTown, even when you're not family, you're oikogeneia. When your chef of 25 years dies at age 63 of prostate cancer — the man you worked side by side with every day for a quarter century, not including the time you worked together in Athens before you crossed the pond — when he dies, does it hurt any less that he's not your "flesh and blood"?

Oikogeneia.

It's customary to thank your host for a great meal, your shopkeeper for great service. The merchants of GreekTown, however, are due another thank you. Thank You for putting the family in family business. For showing us that when you're family, everything goes according to plan — even when there isn't a plan. For reminding us that family isn't just the most important thing we've got.

It's all we've got.

— Sholom Wargon

Demetre's hits right note for Streisand

During Barbra Streisand's 2006 concert tour at the Air Canada Centre, on both Oct. 17 and 20, the illustrious singer told audiences that she loved the ice cream she'd had at the original Caffé Demetre on the Danforth. Owners Themy and Alex couldn't have been happier if she'd sung for them personally.

Caffé Demetre

400 Danforth Ave. at Chester
416.778.6654
CDdanforth@rogers.com

Clearly, she of the mellifluous voice has good taste in ice cream. The original Caffé Demetre's hand-made variety goes down as smoothly and sweetly as a Streisand melody. Maintaining this kind of quality doesn't come easily, however. Here, even fresh daily doesn't cut it. At Demetre's, the ice cream is made virtually on demand, so that it always arrives at your table freshly-made. So if you find Themy or Alex short of breath, it's because they've been running downstairs to churn out another fresh batch, then galloping upstairs with the booty.

Since opening in 1989, Caffé Demetre has adhered rigorously to its original home-made ice cream recipe; it's difficult to improve on perfection. But Demetre's is much more than an ice cream parlour. Their crêpes and Belgian waffles are made according to the same exacting standards and with the same premium fresh ingredients, as are the sauces drizzled irresistibly over desserts too numerous to name, one more mouthwatering than the next. Bowls, cones, splits, sundaes, cake-and-ice-cream combos — this is not a place for self-restraint. The good news is, the quality and freshness of the ingredients is such that you can overindulge a little without experiencing the annoying, cloyingly sweet aftertaste so common with conventional ice cream desserts. The coffees — both conventional and specialty — are all top-drawer.

Of Demetre's many popular ice cream flavours, White Chocolate is an all-time favourite. Among the 17 varieties of crêpes and Belgian waffles, Moo La La has made major inroads into the nosh consciousness of Demetre's clientele. Apparently, Nutello Crunch Iced Cream drizzled with Nutella® Sauce and garnished with Sliced Bananas and Roasted Hazelnuts will do that to you.

Despite Demetre's soaring popularity — off the charts since Streisand sang its praises — Themy and Alex are adamant about remaining well-grounded. "You're only as good as your last batch of ice cream," says Alex. "You can taste the difference quality makes, and we will never compromise that — ever."

Minto's "green" technologies garner major award, raise bar for urban development

Canadian Urban Institute acknowledges builder's contribution with 2007 Leadership Award for City Livability

Artist's concept

mintoSkyy features stunning architecture, spectacular suite layouts, sweeping balconies, breathtaking views, quality finishes and energy saving, cost reducing green initiatives

In an era when environmental concerns are front of mind, one builder has stepped up to the plate with environmentally-friendly innovations that demonstrate a commitment to energy saving and, in turn, a higher and healthier standard of living for you, the home buyer.

MintoUrban Communities is among the recipients of the 2007 Leadership Awards presented by the Canadian Urban Institute. Minto, a real estate development construction and management company dedicated to sustainable development and healthy environments, was presented with the City Livability Award. This award honours outstanding individuals and corporations that have made meaningful contributions to the quality of urban life by creating more livable spaces in Toronto.

"We put our customers and the environment first"
— Alan Greenberg

Minto's winning submission demonstrated leadership in improving city livability by addressing five major urban environmental issues: Natural Resource Conservation; Air Quality; Waste Diversion; Education; and Market Transformation.

Minto continues to set new standards for buildings that are sustainable and energy efficient. In 2005, Minto committed to designing and building all of its high-rise communities as LEED® Canada (Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design) rated buildings. LEED® is a third party verification standard for developing high-performance, sustainable buildings. In 2005 Minto's new development Radiance@MintoGardens, located in North York, was the first and is still the only LEED®-Canada Silver certified condominium in the country.

"Minto's approach is to put our customers and the environment first. That's why our goal is to build all our future apartments and condominiums to the LEED® standard of design and construction," says Alan Greenberg, President, MintoUrban Communities Inc.

"Through healthy-living building practices, LEED® buildings provide better air quality and a more comfortable and healthy indoor environment for residents, as well they realize substantial cost savings on their utilities," says Andrew Pride, Vice-President of Minto Energy Management.

Minto has also been selected among the very best in the country to construct an environmentally friendly home as part of the CMHC Equilibrium Housing Initiative. Inspiration™ The Minto Eco-Home is currently under construction in Manotick, Ontario and will deliver on the goal of the CMHC Initiative to create healthy, energy-efficient housing that produces as much energy as it consumes on a yearly basis.

Minto energy innovations are unique and extensive, reducing overall consumption by over 35% compared to code. The Minto-inspired HRV (heat recovery ventilation) delivers fresh, filtered air to each suite and circulates healthy air throughout for improved ventilation and living comfort. The energy saving "All off Switch" turns off all ceiling lights and exhaust fans with the flick of one switch.

Other environmental features in new Minto developments include renewable passive solar energy; rainwater harvesting; low flow showerheads and dual flush toilets; energy efficient appliances; motion sensor controls on common area lighting; compact fluorescent lighting; ease of use of public transit by being located close to the subway line; the installation of multi-stream waste systems; green power through renewable energy certificates.

"Substantial cost savings on your utilities"
— Andrew Pride

Minto has seen results that are clear and measurable: waste diversion rates exceed 70% due to innovative and convenient multi-stream waste systems, and over 50% less water consumption has been tracked over a typical new building (saving 30,000,000 litres of water annually).

As an industry leader, Minto has been recognized with:

- 2007 Minto Roehampton Tree Planting Ceremony with Mayor Miller to celebrate Canada's newest and greenest rental building;
- 2007 Minto is asked to be part of the CMHC Equilibrium Housing Initiative and begins plans to build Inspiration™ The Minto EcoHome;
- 2005 & 2006 City of Toronto, Green Toronto Award of Excellence;
- 2006 Globe Award of Excellence in Urban Sustainability, Finalist;
- 2005 Natural Resources Canada Energy Efficiency Award;
- 2004 Environmental Building of the Year for MintoYorkville from the Urban Development Institute.

Among its many awards, the 2007 City Livability Award underscores Minto's commitment to environmental leadership that will improve the quality of life for its residents while playing an integral part in creating a healthier, more livable Toronto.

Rice advances U.S. peace plan

By DAN BARON

JERUSALEM — Condoleezza Rice was back in the Middle East last Wednesday, her efforts to promote Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation seemingly buoyed by regional concerns over Hamas' recent takeover of the Gaza Strip.

The U.S. secretary of state arrived in Israel bearing a potentially groundbreaking pledge by Saudi Arabia – a major Islamist power broker and client of Washington – to participate in a comprehensive peace conference.

"This is a time to seize opportunities – and it is a time to proceed in a prepared and careful way, as one does not want to miss opportunities because of a lack of preparation – but it is nonetheless a time when we have to take advantage of what is before us," Rice said after meeting her Israeli counterpart, Tzipi Livni.

Last Thursday, on the final leg of her Middle East tour, Rice visited Ramallah for talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Salam Fayyad, the western-backed reformist he appointed prime minister after firing the previous Hamas-led cabinet. Rice was bidding to energize talks between the moderate Abbas and Israel as part of a peace push outlined by U.S. President George W. Bush in a July 16 speech.

"We do have in the Palestinian territories a government that is devoted to the international principles, the foundational principles for peace,

Bible holds clue to anti-viral extract

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN

TEL AVIV — For most of his professional life, Tel Aviv University professor Michael Ovadia focused on snakes and the medicinal properties of their venom. But seven years ago, after he meditated on a biblical passage, Ovadia's career focus took a twist – a cinnamon twist to be exact.

Today, the spiritual scientist from the university's department of zoology is commercializing a unique cinnamon extract that is touted to fight viral infections from HIV to avian flu.

A research and licence deal on Ovadia's patent-pending cinnamon extract was signed last week between Ramot, the Tel Aviv University's technology transfer company, and Frutarom, a multinational nutraceutical company based in Israel. Frutarom is expected to use the extract in a whole host of applications, from a spray to disinfect the air against avian flu in airports to a daily supplement that protects people against the common flu.

Those doing research in the field of natural medicine know that snake venom, especially the notorious, poisonous kind, has unique anti-viral and analgesic properties that can help fight human illness and disease. For the past 40 years, Ovadia had been working with natural antidotes and found that certain kinds of venom can deactivate the parainfluenza (Sendai) virus – a virus similar to the human flu.

Work was going well. Papers were published, patents had been developed, and his reputation in the field was established. But Ovadia was still waiting for the breakthrough that every scientist dreams about.

That breakthrough would come to him one morning in the synagogue while listening to a reading from the Old Testament.

"There is a passage that explains how the high priests – the kohanim – would prepare a holy oil used on their bodies before they made a ritual animal sacrifice," Ovadia recalls. "I had a hunch that this oil, which was prepared with cinnamon and other spices, played a role in preventing the spread of infectious agents to people."

Ovadia took his hunch to the laboratory, and his initial experiments proved to be true: his savoury cinnamon extract was able to quickly and effectively immunize chicken

CANADA

$5 Million Raised

CALGARY — The Alberta leg of a national fundraising campaign for the yet-to-be-built Canadian Museum for Human Rights kicked off last week with the announcement of $5 million in donations from the oil-rich province. That leaves $150 million to be raised for the $350-million, Winnipeg-based museum, for which construction is slated to start in 2008, CanWest News reported. The museum is also receiving funding from all three levels of government and is slated to open in 2011.

Harper, Olmert Talk

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert discussed security issues and prospects for Mideast peace in a 15-minute phone call last week. A spokesperson for Harper said the two men spoke about Israeli relations with the Palestinian Authority and on U.S efforts to arrange a Mideast peace conference. Harper also briefed Olmert on last month's visit to Ottawa by Jordan's King Abdullah, Canadian Press reported.

WORLD

Reporter Threatened

MOSCOW — A Jewish journalist was threatened at gunpoint by a Russian police officer in an anti-Semitic incident. An officer in the city of Angarsk, in Irkutsk region, pointed a gun at Anna Gritsevich, a local TV journalist, then cursed at her and made anti-Semitic remarks, the website Jewish.ru reported. The incident is being probed.

Academics Sign Petition Against Boycott

NEW YORK — More than 10,000 academics have signed a petition demanding a halt to the campaign by Britian's academic union to boycott Israel.

The petition, organized by the U.S.-based Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, was signed by 32 Nobel laureates and 53 university and foundation presidents. The group will deliver it to the University College Union as "an expression of outrage" against the proposed boycott.

"We are academics, scholars, researchers and professionals of differing religious and political perspectives. We all agree that singling out Israelis for an academic boycott is wrong," the statement says. "To show our solidarity with our Israeli academics, we… declare ourselves to be Israeli academics for the purposes of any academic boycott."

The signatories pledged to decline to participate in any activity from which Israeli academics are excluded.

Scholars for Peace in the Middle East is an independent, non-profit community of scholars with more than 18,000 academics and professional members from more than 400 campuses worldwide.

Karaite Conversions

SAN JOSE — A fringe Jewish sect that rejects post-biblical rabbinic law accepted its first converts in 500 years last week. The Karaite Jews of America, which has 1,000 members, gathered in a northern California synagogue for the event, j. the Jewish news weekly of Northern California reported. After a year of study, 10 adults and four minors from as far afield as the Czech Republic, Australia and Canada converted to Karaite Judaism. Karaites trace their origins to eighth-century Persia and are estimated at 35,000 worldwide. A decision 15 years ago by the Karaite Council of Sages in Israel reversed a ban on accepting converts. The rejection of rabbinic law has led to odd customs, such as mixing of milk and poultry, but Karaites don't use lights on Shabbat.

Mossad Offers Help

SOFIA — The Mossad helped free the medical team sentenced to death in Libya, Bulgaria's intelligence chief said July 30. Gen. Kirtcho Kirov told the 24-Tchassa daily that Israel's spy agency was one of 20 security services that were active in trying to release a Palestinian doctor and five Bulgarian nurses convicted in Libya for infecting children with AIDS. The six were allowed to return to their countries last week. Besides the Mossad and western spy agencies, some Arab countries, including Egypt, Algeria and Morocco, provided helpful information, Kirov said.

Jews Donate Coats

SAO PAULO — Sao Paulo's Jewish community donated 10,000 winter coats to a government-run campaign. Representatives from the Sao Paulo State Jewish Federation presented last month's donation to First Lady Monica Serra, who heads the annual Coats Campaign, which collects coats, blankets and pillows for the poor. Sao Paulo is home to half of Brazil's 120,000 Jews.

New hechsher intended as alternative to COR

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Six food establishments in the Greater Toronto Area are now being supervised by Mehadrin Kosher, a new kashrut supervisory body led by Rabbi Moshe Levy, spiritual leader of Nachal Yisrael, a small synagogue and beit midrash on Bathurst Street south of Wilson Avenue.

Rabbi Levy, who received his smichah in France and has been here for about 28 years, said his goal is to strictly adhere to all kashrut laws, "through knowledgeable, dedicated and experienced kashrut professionals."

He took over the hechsher earlier this year after being associated with a New York-based rabbi who had been supervising a local restaurant.

Rabbi Levy said he himself was subsequently contacted by several other restaurant owners and caterers who wanted to become or remain kosher, but had experienced difficulties with the Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada, which supervises more than 900 facilities in Canada and has its COR symbol on more than 45,000 products.

"My idea is that if I open the door for more kosher supervision, more people will eat kosher," Rabbi Levy said.

He stressed that his decision had nothing to do with making money, but rather that he wants to make it easier for people to run a kosher establishment.

"I make sure that they run a 100 per cent kosher business. I am there for every catering event from beginning to end, and ensure that all retail stores are strictly supervised," he said

Other than the Kashruth Council, Mehadrin Kosher is the only supervisory body offering hechshers to Toronto-area restaurants and caterers, although the Los Angeles-based KSA hechsher supervises a number of local food manufacturers, such as Ozery's Pita Break Inc., and supervises a Krispy Kreme donut shop in Mississauga.

Michelle and Malcolm Nefsky, owners of Bagel Haven, a dairy restaurant located at Bathurst and Steeles Avenue – the only Mehadrin-supervised retail proprietor willing to talk to The CJN or be named in an article about the new hechsher – have been supervised by Rabbi Levy since February, the couple said.

"We have owned the restaurant since October 1996, and we have always wanted to be kosher. Our home is strictly kosher, and we wanted our restaurant to be an extension of who we are," Malcolm Nefsky said.

They approached the Kashruth Council, Michelle said, but were told that to have COR supervision, they would need a shomer Shabbat partner. "Malcolm grew up in a Reform household, and in my family they are secular Jews from Israel. We are a Jewish family with strong Jewish traditions," she said.

Rabbi Levy's approach, she said, was to be inclusive and embracing. "He accepted us for who we are, and he asked how he could help make our dream of running a kosher restaurant a reality."

When he met with their staff, she said, he was kind and respectful. "He taught them about ritual hand washing, and about not bringing any food into the restaurant. They now understand how careful they have to be in all aspects of the business."

Representatives from the Kashruth Council were not available to speak to The CJN, but Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, president of the Toronto Vaad Harabonim, said he is concerned about having a second kashrut supervisory body in the city.

"The history of COR is not the history of a business, but rather of a communal organization. Years ago, kashrut in our city was supervised by individual rabbis, and it was not in the community's best interest. The best scenario is to have all rabbis working together. Community supervision needs to be standard."

Rabbi Tradburks said that in the past six months, COR has changed its policy about proprietors having a shomer Shabbat partner. "If a mashgiach is present in the facility full time, then it is not necessary."

Part of the frustration with having a non-COR hechsher in the community, he said, is that consumers might not be familiar with the supervisor. "When they walk into an establishment, they may not know anything about the kashrut supervision. What are they supposed to do?"

It disturbs him, he said, that most proprietors being supervised by Mehadrin do not want to be named in the newspaper. "That is the crux right there. There is no transparency."

His assessment, he said, is that kosher supervision is like any other contract. "It requires a lot of professionalism. It has to be thorough and reliable."

A vital question

From the editor's desk

Noted legal scholar and Harvard University professor Noah Feldman triggered an emotional and intellectual firestorm in the Jewish, and especially the Orthodox, community with his cri de coeur, Orthodox Paradox, which appeared in the Sunday New York Times Magazine on July 22. (Please see the submission by Rabbi J. Immanuel Schochet on page 43.)

Feldman describes the pain and hurt he feels at having been shunned by much of his childhood community because he married someone who is not Jewish. The alumni association of his yeshiva day school in Boston even cropped him and his wife out of a class reunion photo.

The tone of the essay is serious and full of ache. But it is less soul-searching than it is smugly supercilious. At times, it is even disingenuous, as when the author, who is renowned for his intellectual acuity, expresses surprise at the halachic-based decision-making, cultural mores and social framework of the world in which he was raised, and in particular, of the high school that, however imperfectly, tried to perpetuate that way of life.

Toward the end of the article, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the true purpose of the article may have been to exhale bad fumes about modern Orthodoxy's need to draw precise lines and boundaries around the community. Feldman cites the cases of Yigal Amir, the assassin of prime minister Yizhak Rabin, and Baruch Goldstein, the murderer of some 30 Arabs in a Hebron mosque more than a decade ago, presumably as extreme examples of the "evil" that can result when the protectionist line is drawn too tightly.

But why cite these examples at all? The two men and their behaviour were aberrations, gross exceptions to the rule. Their actions proved nothing about the broader societies that reared them. And certainly, the issues underpinning their cases were entirely irrelevant to the issue underpinning Feldman's own case, namely, how should we, as individuals and as a community, relate to and respond to intermarried couples?

The responses to Feldman came quickly and covered the range from sympathetic and understanding to stern and uncompromising.

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, the American talk-show host celebrity, who knows Feldman from Oxford University days, takes a conciliatory approach.

"I am well aware of the fact that intermarriage is a direct threat to the very continuity of the Jewish People. But that does not change the fact that those who have chosen to marry out are still Jewish, should still be encouraged to go to synagogue, should still be encouraged to put on tfillin and keep Shabbat, should still have mezuzot on their doors, and should still be encouraged to devote their lives and resources to the welfare of the Jewish people and the security of the State of Israel.

"And as far as their non-Jewish spouses are concerned, do we really believe that by showing the most unfriendly behaviour, we are living up to our biblically mandated role of serving as a light unto the nations? Is there any possibility that a non-Jew who is married to a Jew would look favourably at the possibility of becoming halachically Jewish if they witness Orthodox Jews treating their husband or wife as pariahs?"

Rabbi Avi Shafran, the director of public affairs for Agudath Israel of America is less accommodating to Feldman and his predicament.

"If one begins with the premise that intermarriage is dangerous to the Jewish people and the Jewish mission, the intermarried cannot enjoy public acceptance. There may be quibbles about the means by which we express our rejection of their choice. But the absence of any communal expression of reproach is nothing less than an invitation to intermarriage."

Gary Rosenblatt, the veteran, wise editor and publisher of the Jewish Week in New York aptly summarized the dilemma tugging at the heart of Feldman's story.

"What Feldman has done, consciously or not, is raise some important issues, less about his old yeshiva and modern Orthodoxy per se than about dealing with Jews who do not see marrying out as leaving the fold.

"Conversion is the most obvious and desired solution, but for those who eschew that option, we need to explore ways to encourage their positive exposure to Jewish life."

Although Rosenblatt also found much for which to criticize Feldman in his problematic portraiture of modern Orthodoxy, he preferred to conclude by honing in on the incontrovertibly pressing issue confronting world Jewry. He referred to the article as, in part, a "wake-up call" about "learning how to deal more sensitively with those on the outside who may be calling out – in anger and loneliness – for a way back in."

And as Rosenblatt also pointed out, the discussion is an important one. He quotes Prof. Jonathan Sarna of Brandeis University, who estimates that 1.7 million non-Jews currently live in American Jewish households. "To put it another way, about 23 per cent of those living in Jewish households [in the United States] are not Jewish."

The question calls to us all.

As individuals and as an organized – though-stratified-into-different-streams – community, we must search our minds as well as our hearts and our consciences. When fellow Jews reach out to us, do we help our people by not reaching back? Are we not our brother's keeper?

–MBD

JEWISH POVERTY: LIVING LIFE ON THE FRINGE

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Janine (not her real name) arrived in Toronto via Israel from her native Balarus, she thought she had finally made it.

Trained as a laboratory technician, the single mother of an eight-year-old son and 13-year-old daughter fully expected to find an apartment, upgrade her English skills and find a job in her field.

Yet she's luckier than others she knows, she said, because during the week – she works from noon to 5 p.m. – she eats an early dinner with her employer, and on Shabbat the family is often invited out, "so I'm able to save money on my food bill."

There is no room for anything extra in her budget and she is always having to say "no" to her son and daughter. "I feel badly that they can't go to movies with their friends or go out for ice cream," she said.

"After I pay my rent, I have $1,200 to buy food, toiletries, clothing for my children, pay off the computer they need to do their school work, and buy gas for my 12-year-old car that I need to get to work. Anything extra, and I have to rely on my overdraft. After that, nothing. The money is gone. Sometimes it's gone before the month is up."

"I'm grateful, though, that my landlord is good-natured. If I'm late with my rent, he waits patiently. I also get a subsidy to send my children to Hebrew day school, and this past Passover, I received a food basket that got us through most of the week."

Regardless, there is no peace for her, she said. "I live day by day, worrying that I'll lose my job or have an emergency expense."

According to the 2001 Census Analysis Series on Immigration and Language in the Toronto Jewish Community, prepared by UIA Federations Canada demographers Charles Shahar and Tina Rosenbaum in 2005, immigrants such as Janine are especially vulnerable financially.

The report states that immigrants face a window of economic vulnerability that lasts for at least a decade, and is especially stark in the five years immediately following their arrival here.

At 31 per cent, it says, poverty among recent immigrants is among the highest of any segment of the Jewish community.

Janis Roth, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Toronto, and Richard Cummings, executive director of Jewish Family and Child (formerly Jewish Family and Child Service), are co-chairs of the Jewish Action Poverty Group, which is trying to confront this problem, as well as the wider issue of poverty in the Jewish community.

The seeds for the action group were planted about two years ago, Roth said, after representatives from a number of local social service agencies attended a conference in Ottawa on poverty in the Jewish community that was sponsored by the Canadian branch of the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies.

A keynote speaker at the conference was David Bornstein, author of How to Change the World: Social Entrepreneurs and the Power of New Ideas, "and he talked about people who had the will and drive to change situations," she said.

"He motivated us enough to start thinking about attacking the problem of poverty differently – how we could make sustainable changes that would have a huge impact on the community."

The Jewish anti-poverty group is made up of representatives from agencies such as Reena, Jewish Family and Child, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, JIAS, Jewish Vocational Service and Kehilla Residential Program, "but they don't participate with their agency hat. They're here as individuals concerned about finding a solution," Roth said.

Their main focus, she said, is the working poor, "because as a group, they're on the fringe. They're not eligible for financial assistance, yet they don't have enough funds to live in a dignified way."

> 'After I pay my rent, I have $1,200 to buy food, toiletries, clothing for my children, pay off the computer they need to do their school work, and buy gas for my 12-year-old car that I need to get to work. Anything extra, and I have to rely on my overdraft. After that, nothing. The money is gone. Sometimes it's gone before the month is up.'

Rather than merely helping them out by giving them subsidies to summer camp, Chanukah presents or Passover food baskets, "we want to look at ways to help them move out of poverty," Roth added.

"The kids are sent to camp, but then they return to the same hard living conditions. We have to do better than that. All these things help people maintain a certain level, but it's not changing the family experience. If we don't do something different, we'll have to raise more money just to sustain people."

She stressed that she is not criticizing fundraising efforts in the Jewish community, "but what we do now is falling short of moving people out of poverty. What we have to do is elevate them."

Cummings agreed that although providing financial assistance and helping clients live Jewishly by sending almost 400 children to summer camps, providing food at holiday time, and helping them celebrate the holidays is a significant part of his agency's work in addressing poverty, "we need to do much more. We need to step up to the plate in recognizing our responsibility to a vulnerable group who could be forgotten."

He said his agency is working with Mount Sinai Hospital to develop psychological support for people who are living in poverty due to mental health issues, with the aim of removing barriers to possible employment.

The people most in need, Roth said, are the most invisible. "These are the people who go to work every day, and who struggle to pay for housing and food, let alone their Jewish connectedness."

One way to help, she said, is to look at people's job skills. "Many of them are stuck in survival jobs, so we're planning to have a number of adults reassessed for free. The idea is to get them into jobs that pay enough to support their families.

"By helping them find full-time employment, we could raise the income power of the family."

Her agency also looks at the transitional poverty of newcomers. "Many are skilled, but it takes at least nine months to get a job, and they can use up a lot of savings during that time," Roth said.

"We have found that if we help them quickly, they won't need assistance for an extended period of time."

JIAS, she said, has introduced the Jump Start program, which matches immigrants with jobs that utilize their skills. "Through this program clients have been finding good employment quicker."

As for housing, said Roth, "families are moved out of poverty when they live in a clean, safe, well-furnished house for which they pay no more than 32 per cent of their salary. Most poor people, however, pay up to 72 per cent."

To address this problem, the Kehilla Residential Program, a UJA Federation-affiliated agency whose mandate is to identify and champion affordable housing initiatives, has created the Jewish Community Affordable Rental program.

Nancy Singer, executive director of Kehilla and a member of the Jewish Action Poverty Group, said the federation initiative, co-ordinated by Kehilla, was started so people could afford to live in the Jewish community along the Bathurst Street corridor.

"Landlords who participate in the program, in return for providing a few apartment units per building at more affordable rent levels, are guaranteed assured rental income for five years, and thus reduced vacancies and stable cash flow."

The program guarantees any arrears – since the program started in 2004 there has been only one case of arrears – and it also negotiates the rent based on a client's budget, as well as prescreens all clients and assists in resolving any landlord-tenant issues that may arise, Singer said.

"There is a premium to live in the Jewish community, and through this program we've been able to bring some people back."

As well, she said, people who have had their income stretched as far as it can go have a few more dollars at the end of the month.

Another initiative, said Singer, is the community residential building, set to be erected on the new Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus being built in York Region.

The building is a proposed 62-unit affordable supportive housing project that will provide both housing and support services for a mix of special needs populations in the community.

Along with Kehilla as the development consultant and Reena as the lead sponsor agency, partner agencies that will provide support services to residents include Chai Tikvah, Circle of Care and Jewish Family and Child.

Singer said Kehilla is also exploring the potential for an affordable home ownership program. "The challenge of this exercise is to overcome the gap between the costs of building new homes and the price most of the target group can afford."

It is imperative, she said, that agencies collaborate and put their expertise on the table.

"Poverty, unfortunately, is the link between all of them."

Netanyahu faces major challenge in Likud race

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Likud leader and former Israeli prime minister Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu will have a real fight on his hands when he faces Moshe Feiglin at the party's leadership primaries on Aug. 14 in Israel, claims Feiglin's spokesperson, Shmuel Sackett.

"Moshe Feiglin has an excellent chance to win," said Sackett, the cofounder, with Feiglin, of the Manhigut Yehudit (Jewish leadership) faction in the Likud party.

In Toronto last month to speak to local supporters, Sackett said Manhigut Yehudit is on a roll.

In an interview, he declared, "Winning can mean either an outright victory in these primaries or a large percentage of the vote, which would result in tremendous political power."

He added, "In either case, victory is inevitable because Manhigut Yehudit has the right message. Bibi Netanyahu does not represent what the Likud stands for. The only candidate here who is true to his platform and his word is Moshe Feiglin."

Moshe Feiglin

Sackett, Manhigut Yehudit's international director, said that this month's leadership battle has boiled down to a race between Netanyahu and Feiglin now that top-flight candidate and former foreign minister Silvan Shalom has dropped out.

"The leading newspapers and all sides of the political spectrum in Israel agree that Moshe Feiglin is a serious candidate who could win the election," Sackett said, adding that Feiglin's popularity as choice for Likud leader has climbed from three per cent to 14 per cent since the last two primaries.

Ardent adversaries of territorial compromise, Feiglin and Sackett cofounded Manhigut Yehudit after establishing Zo Artzeinu (This is our Land) in 1993 to protest Israel's signing of the Oslo accords with the Palestinians.

Due to his non-violent activities during this period, Feiglin, a yeshiva graduate who was a captain in the Israeli army, served a six-month sentence for civil disobedience.

Sackett said Feiglin – a resident of the Karnei Shomron settlement in the West Bank – wants to restore Jewish pride inside Israel.

"Our platform is one of a return to Jewish values, and consists of five major points: return to family values, traditional Jewish education for all Jewish children, security without the Oslo illusion, electoral reform in the court system and zero tolerance for Arab rebellion."

Manhigut Yehudit is not promoting Iranian-style theocracy in Israel, he said.

"We are 100 per cent against any religious coercion and are not working toward a theocracy. Our Israel could not and would never be like Iran, God forbid."

Saying that Feiglin embodies the aspirations of many Israelis, Sackett commented, "Most of the country is behind him in wanting Jewish values and a strong Jewish identity."

Sackett said that Manhigut Yehudit supporters range from secular to religious Israelis.

"Feiglin's support base continues to grow as more and more Israelis realize that there is hope on the horizon, and that just because they have been led to a cliff, it doesn't mean that they have to jump off."

Sackett said Israel's political system is in dire need of reform.

As he put it, "Israel has clearly ceased to be a true democracy. Moishe Feiglin will promote legislation to ensure that Supreme Court justices are elected by the Knesset, the representatives of the people, and not by the current method in which the justices elect their cronies."

Claiming that Netanyahu has deviated from Likud dogma, Sackett said that, while Netanyahu opposes a unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank, he does not really oppose the concept of a negotiated pullout.

"You will not catch Netanyahu opposing the very idea of a withdrawal from Judea and Samaria, nor will you catch him ever ruling out the destruction of communities and the expulsion of Jews in these lands from which he is prepared to withdraw."

Sackett said Netanyahu is ready to make serious territorial compromises to reach an agreement with the Arabs.

In an indirect reference to the West Bank, Sackett said, "There will be no Palestinian state inside Israel. Israeli forces will remain inside all parts of Israel protecting all of its citizens."

Regarding the current power struggle between Fatah and Hamas, Sackett said Manhigut Yehudit does not distinguish between "moderate" and "other" terrorists.

Asked how Israel can stop Palestinian militants from firing Qassam rockets into Israel, he said, "The army will not hew to 'turn-the-other-cheek' limitations when it comes to stopping the Qassams."

Sackett said that Israel should never relinquish the Golan Heights.

"There will be no negotiating land-for-peace with Syria or any other Arab nation. The land of Israel was given to us by the Almighty and is not negotiable."

One Family Fund brings young Israelis to Ont.

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Twenty-one young Israelis flew to Toronto recently to sightsee in southern Ontario and to spend about three weeks up north at Camp Timberlane.

The group, aged 12 to 15, are typical of any other: they are boisterous, playful and excited. But they all share a darkness in their past, to which most North American young people cannot relate.

Young Israelis visited southern Ontario this summer.

These Israelis all have some connection to terrorism. Many have family members who have been injured or killed in terrorist attacks.

The Canadian branch of the One Family Fund organized the trip, along with other sponsors, including Camp Timberlane, in the Haliburton Highlands. The camp is letting the kids, who arrived in Toronto on July 22 with two young One Family Fund staff members, stay at the camp free.

"I hope that they are able to change their focus from feeling their pain and suffering every day to finding a positive focus, to be able to move forward, learning about new interests, feeling less stressed or anxious… and just having a break from the trauma that they live with every day," said One Family Fund's Canadian executive director Pam Albert.

The organization was established in Israel after the first intifadah to raise money and provide emotional support for victims of terror. This is the second year that the Canadian branch organized the group trip.

After their arrival, the young people were hosted in small groups by Toronto families and enjoyed a variety of sightseeing activities, including a day trip to Niagara Falls, a tour of the Air Canada Centre, breakfast at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant and shopping at Yorkdale Mall. They left for Camp Timberlane on July 25, where they'll stay until Aug. 16.

Timberlane is not an exclusively Jewish summer camp. "We're trying to make a connection with our kids for the Israeli kids and with the Israeli kids for our kids," said camp director Corey Mandell. "There is a common bond with the Jewish kids immediately."

Bernie Little is a Timberlane alumni, and after visiting the camp last year when the first group of Israelis were there, he wanted to get involved and expand the project. This year, he and his friend Reuben Lerner helped raise more than $65,000 for the trip, including money from a previous sponsor, the Spin Master toy company, and many Timberlane alumni.

"I decided I would take it upon myself to approach a lot of alumni, tell them what was going on and see if they would help sponsor these kids. I was successful in that there were more kids this year," said Little, who is general manager of Nortown Air.

"I'm very emotionally attached to Israel. It gives me a chance to do something and contribute in a tangible way that I can see. I'm also emotionally involved with Camp Timberlane."

Albert said she's "proud of our community for finding a way to do this and providing support, and an opportunity for other kids to be exposed to this."

Mayan Lalazri is a 15-year-old Israeli visiting Canada for the first time. She is bubbly and warm, eager to share her story and frustrated when her English fails her mid-train of thought. She dresses like a typical trendy North American teen, in a bejeweled white hoodie and white flats, and her azul blue eyeliner rims dark, expressive brown eyes.

"It's so, so, so amazing," she gushed about the trip, the day before she was set to leave for Timberlane.

"Everyone is here for one reason, everyone has a big story behind them, and a sad story."

Five years ago, Mayan's father, Naftali, was at the end of his shift, driving a bus near the Gaza Strip, when he came across a chaotic scene. A bomb had exploded on another bus, and the injured passengers were trapped inside with the suicide bomber, alive with gun in hand. Naftali approached the bus, and the passengers screamed for him to open the door and take them to the hospital. The suicide bomber pointed the gun and shot at the bulletproof door, straight at Naftali's face. He ducked down and opened the door.

Naftali managed to shepherd the injured passengers onto his bus and successfully transported them to the hospital. Before that happened, the bomber shot at Naftali once more, and a police officer, a friend, shielded Naftali from the bullet with his own body.

"Since then, my father can't sleep, he can't listen to music – it's not easy for him and I can understand," said Mayan. She first learned about the incident when she saw her father interviewed on television that day.

"I was so worried I started to cry," she remembered.

The day she was leaving for Timberlane, she was excited and grateful to her host family and the One Family Fund.

The UN and Darfur: not quite enough

No one should believe that the resolution passed by the United Nations Security Council last week will stop the slaughter in Darfur. Security Council Resolution 1769 authorized the deployment of up to 26,000 troops and police in the western Sudan region known as Darfur, where since 2003, some quarter million human beings have been murdered and more than 2.5 million displaced from their homes. But these troops will not save too many Darfurians who are running for their lives.

When it is put into place, the new UN force will join the ineffectual 7,000 troops from the African Union already in Darfur. It will be called UNAMID, an acronym for United Nations-African Union Mission in Darfur. The resolution that created UNAMID was significantly eviscerated of true peacekeeping mettle to enable it to pass by China, the protective patron of the duplicitous Sudanese government.

UNAMID forces are not empowered to seize illegal weaponry, disarm militias or arrest suspected war criminals. They can only monitor their movement and operate only "without prejudice to the responsibility of the government of Sudan" – that is, essentially only with the permission of the rogue government in Khartoum. The force will be permitted to fire in self defence and to protect civilians in flight. But it will have neither the legal nor military authorization necessary to stop the fighting, establish and then maintain peace, all of which are the prerequisites to saving the lives of the poor suffering Darfurians.

Moreover, the cost of dispatching these soldiers is a considerable $2 billion per year. Thus, the first UNAMID soldier might not so soon step foot on west Sudanese soil.

But the Security Council decision is not to be totally derided. The 26,000-strong armed force, after all, is the largest-ever Security Council deployment and is indicative, even if only in small increments, of the hardening attitude in the West to a conflict that must be resolved.

In his first visit to the United Nations as British prime minister, Gordon Brown told the Security Council "If any party blocks progress and the killings continue, I and others will redouble our efforts to impose further sanctions." Brown's allusion to "any party who blocks progress" was a transparent reference to the governments in Khartoum and in Beijing.

Two days after Resolution 1769 passed, Canada announced that it will increase its aid contribution to try to help alleviate the humanitarian crisis in Darfur by some $48 million. Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay pegged Canada's total contribution to Darfur over the last three years at $441 million. The money will be disbursed through the Canadian International Development Agency and will be allocated primarily to the delivery of food and other humanitarian aid. Canada is to be commended for its generosity in the cause of saving lives. But none of us should be deceived into believing that the tangled twine of rape, looting, murder, harassment, persecution, prevarication, corruption and deceit on the part of the cynical oppressors of the people in Darfur will be soon straightened out.

Prime Minister Brown said "it was time for a change in Darfur." But little will change until the Security Council sends troops there who will not only fight to save their own lives but who will have the power to fight to prevent the murderers from taking lives.

International attacks on Israel escalated in the wake of the Lebanon war. Palestinian supporters at a UNESCO conference as well as at a women's conference at Concordia University in Montreal charged Israel with using Nazi-like tactics and genocide. In Paris, a terror attack on a Jewish restaurant and adjacent shul killed at least six and injured dozens.

Tory's plan for faith-based schools only

As the Oct. 10 Ontario provincial election approaches, Progressive Conservative leader John Tory's plan to end discrimination against Ontario non-Catholics by bringing non-Catholic faith-based schools into the public school system is sure to be in the news. While it is gratifying to see your ongoing coverage of this issue, it is crucial that your readers receive an accurate account of the PC proposal.

Contrary to last week's story, Tory does not propose to "integrate private and faith-based schools into the public system" but only the latter ("Tory fleshes out school funding pledge," CJN, Aug. 2). True, in his response to Tory, Premier Dalton McGuinty wilfully distorted the PC proposal in that direction. This fabrication, however, speaks not to the facts of the plan but to McGuinty's ongoing disreputable efforts to exploit the Tory proposal and children in non-Catholic faith-based schools for cheap electoral gain.

Shakespeare was a money lender

For generations, Jews have been scorned and humiliated by being called "Shylocks," because of the character created by William Shakespeare ("Bold steps by this Merchant," CJN, From the editor's desk, July 16). So I found it ironic and at the same time comforting to read the following passage in Shakespeare: The Biography, by Peter Ackroyd: "He [Shakespeare's father, John] also lent money at an illegal rate of interest to his neighbours, a trade which passed under the unhappy name of 'usury.' The legal rate was 10 per cent but John Shakespeare lent 100 British pounds to a business colleague at interest of 20 per cent and a further 80 British pounds to another contemporary at the same rate. He charged the excess because it had become standard practice. He could get away with it, in other words. Money-lending was itself widely accepted, in a period where there were no banks or credit facilities, and it was even one in which his son engaged from time to time."

Missionary propaganda

Many Montreal Jews received a DVD in English and in Hebrew with the title Days of Moshiach. This sleek piece of propaganda, picturing a Jew in a prayer shawl blowing a ram's horn, was mailed by a Brooklyn missionary organization whose aim is to convert Jews to their religion. One must examine carefully their website to understand that Jewish themes and Hebrew language are only used to fool and bait Jews. While each individual is free to believe in any religion, it is dishonest to trick people and to harass Jews with this mass mailing. It is also disturbing that such a group managed to acquire a huge list of Jews and their home addresses.

Scientists are modern-day Jeremiahs

Tisha b'Av, which we commemorated this year on July 24, reminds us that more than 2,000 years ago, Jews failed to heed the warnings of the prophet Jeremiah, which resulted in the destruction of the First Temple in Jerusalem.

Now the entire world, not just Jerusalem, faces destruction according to many climate scientists and environmentalists – modern-day "Jeremiahs." Some noted climate experts, including James Hansen of NASA, are warning that global warming could reach a tipping point and spin out of control within a decade, with catastrophic consequences, unless major changes are soon made.

Israel is endangered, since global climate change could reduce the rainfall that Israel is so dependent on and could cause the Mediterranean Sea to rise, threatening the 60 per cent of Israelis who live on its coastal plain.

Israel also has other major environmental problems. More Israelis die from air pollution than from terrorism and automobile accidents combined, and Israeli rivers are badly polluted.

The Jewish people must make tikkun olam a major focus of Jewish life today and consider personal and societal changes that will start to move our precious, but imperilled, planet to a sustainable path. By doing this, we would be performing a great kiddush HaShem.

Palestinians not the only refugees after 1948

The following are excerpts from written testimony sent July 20 by MP Irwin Cotler to the U.S. Congressional Human Rights Caucus in Washington, D.C. The caucus was addressing the issue of Jewish and other refugees left homeless after their mass displacement from Arab countries following World War II.

In 1987, I had occasion, with the late justice Arthur Goldberg of the Supreme Court of the United States, who was then the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, to co-chair a tribunal on justice for Jews from Arab lands.

One of the witnesses who came before us lamented why this was happening 40 years later. Now, 20 years after that tribunal, 60 years after the fact, that lament appears to be more pronounced. Yet there are a number of compelling, indeed urgent considerations that have converged to give this congressional briefing the moral and juridical compellability that it warrants.

The first is the willingness that you are seeing here today – witnesses coming forward to begin to tell their story. The very establishment of a group called Justice for Jews in Arab Countries has, in a sense, four years later, acknowledged and validated the principle of zachor, of remembrance, for people to give their testimony and have it acknowledged and respected, and have their experience recognized and understood.

The second are the massive human rights violations that this briefing will address, exposing the state-sanctioned character of these violations, something that has not been properly appreciated, including Nuremberg-type laws that resulted in forced expulsions.

The third is an evolution in international human rights and humanitarian law that has taken place in the last 10 years. More has happened in the last 10 years than in the previous 60 years. The principles that underpin this briefing and bring us here today – (1) the right to memory, zachor; (2) the right to truth; (3) the pursuit of justice; (4) the right of redress; (5) the obligation to remember and make redress – these are not just normative principles, they are now principles of international human rights and humanitarian law.

The fourth reason is that the whole question of refugees and refugee claims is at the forefront of the peace process, and is integral to the "road map" peace plan – indeed the Quartet (United States, Russia, European Union and United Nations) is meeting to-day in Lisbon – and that gives the issue of refugees a compellability in regard to the peace process.

May I share with you a number of principles that must underpin this briefing and allow for an appreciation of the compellability of the issues.

The first principle addresses the whole question of the pursuit of truth and the duty of remembrance. We are speaking here not just about "a forgotten exodus," as it has been called, but behind the statistics are the lives of human beings. We're talking about universes. You had, in 1948, close to 900,000 Jews in Arab lands. Today, there are fewer than 8,000 remaining in some 10 Arab countries. This is astonishing. And, as I say, we're not talking about just statistics; we're talking in human terms – 97 per cent of Jews from Arab countries having left their countries of origin, where Jews were living for over 2,500 years.

We're not talking about "a forgotten exodus," but about the forced expulsion of these Jews. This forced expulsion was the result of state-orchestrated, state-sanctioned patterns of oppression, which included beatings; which included persecutions; which included pogroms described in a report I co-authored in 2003 titled Jewish Refugees: The Case for Rights and Redress.

Most important, the report detailed the enactment in the Arab countries of Nuremberg-type laws which decreed, for example, that Jews were the enemies of the state in which they lived, that Jews were to be denied or forfeit their citizenship, that their property was to be sequestered, that their assets were to be seized, which effectively destroyed their livelihood as well as the lives of complete communities. This Nuremberg-type dimension has not been sufficiently known, let alone appreciated.

What has emerged from this report is that these massive human rights violations – there is no other term to describe them – were not simply events that occurred coincidentally or haphazardly, or as a result of state sanctions or repression. There was a concerted effort here that suggests a criminal intention that in effect robbed the Jews of their livelihood, if not also their lives and communities.

The principles of the rights to justice ensure under international human rights and humanitarian law that victims of such massive human rights violations have a right to redress for those human rights violations.

Those responsible for such violations have a duty to make redress. This principle is set forth in international human rights and humanitarian law. There is even the related principle of unjust enrichment. Not only were properties forcibly sequestered, assets seized and bank accounts blocked, but the Arab countries, in effect, have had the benefit from this type of illegal action for all these years. So there is a case to be made of continuing unjust enrichment that needs to be redressed.

The principle of reconciliation must also be addressed. As has been shown in every country in which the pursuit of truth and the right to justice and redress have been examined, these are prerequisites to reconciliation between people as well as between states. The integrity of a peace process requires the acknowledgment of the truth and the justice that underpin the conflict, and this is something that has not properly been addressed.

There is also the principle of prevention. Not only do you have the matter of truth and justice, but reconciliation will allow for the prevention of such conflict in the future.

Having regard to these principles of truth and justice and reconciliation and state responsibility for massive human rights violations, the time has come to rectify this historical injustice.

Any narrative on the Middle East that does not include justice for Jewish refugees is a case study in Middle East revisionism. It is an assault on truth and memory and justice. Rights for Jewish refugees from Arab countries have to be part of any peace process if that peace process is going to have integrity.

The United Nations bears express responsibility for this distorted narrative, for this case study in Mideast revisionism. Since 1947, there have been some 687 resolutions of the UN General Assembly which have dealt with the Arab-Israeli conflict. Of these, 101 have dealt only with Palestinian refugees. Not one resolution, not one of these 101 resolutions of the General Assembly, dealt with Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

I am not saying that the UN should not have dealt with the issue of Palestinian refugees. That is part of the issue of truth, justice and reconciliation. But to have dealt only with the issue of Palestinian refugees and not to have addressed, in any of the resolutions, the issue of Jewish refugees, and for that matter, Christian refugees as well, is not only a matter of a distorted narrative, but is contributing to the injustice.

If one studies the UN's involvement in the singling out of Israel for differential and discriminatory treatment in the international arena, serious questions are raised about the appropriateness of the United Nations' having a role in the Quartet.

Unless the UN assumes its responsibility in the pursuit of justice, in the proper duties of remembrance and in the right of redress, we are speaking here of a misrepresentation and distortion of the narrative by that body. It is inconceivable and unjust for any narrative of the Mideast not to include the story of Jewish refugees from Arab countries and their rights to redress.

A Middle East narrative that would be founded on the principles of truth and justice and that would lead to reconciliation would have to acknowledge a situation where refugees – both Palestinian Arab refugees and Jewish refugees from Arab lands – are both the joint victims of the Arab-Israeli conflict. I would say the joint victims of the Arab war against Israel in 1947 and 1948.

You can sum up the historical pattern of the Israeli-Palestinian Arab conflict under the rubric of double rejectionism. By double rejectionism, I mean that the Arab leadership and the Palestinian leadership, were prepared to forgo the establishment of a Palestinian state, if that meant countenancing a Jewish state.

That was true, in effect, in relation to the UN Partition Resolution of 1947. For, if partition had been accepted by Arab leaders at the time, there would have been no refugees – either Arab or Jewish refugees. Fast forward to Camp David and Taba – the same situation.

But if you look at the historical narrative in terms of truth and justice and reconciliation, one cannot ignore the fact that you have this double rejectionism which was also related to a double aggression. Not only was there a rejection of a Palestinian state if it meant accepting an Israeli state, but war was launched against Israel to eclipse the nascent state in 1947.

On a second front, reprisals were launched against the Jews in their own countries as part of this pattern of repression, both internationally and domestically.

To conclude, what we are dealing with here is a foundational principle, not only on a normative level, but foundational principles now enshrined in international human rights and humanitarian law. Not only are the rights of memory, zachor, a central idiom of the Jewish tradition, but there is a duty of remembrance under international law, namely, the duty of respecting the narrative of victims of human rights violations.

Only in this fashion, can we move from truth, to justice – to reconciliation between and among all peoples in the region.

It's not easy being free

Paradox or cliché, the bumper sticker gave me pause. It's a truism that nothing is free – ironically, not even freedom. I was fascinated by the many ways in which freedom is not free (and the many ways we take so precious an item for granted).

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

People living in a free society are not free to do as they please. We're compelled to follow the rules. We can't drive on the wrong side of the road. We can't steal or murder. We must pay taxes. All societies have rules. Some are established to promote freedom, while others are not. Discerning the difference is a challenge and history is replete with controversies surrounding the debate. Nonetheless, even in a free society, we are not really free to act in any way we wish.

So why is freedom cherished?

Freedom of choice is a key to democratic social and political structures. Voting is crucial to this configuration, yet it took many years for western civilizations to recognize that women and some minorities deserved this choice. The debate over free choice continues in other areas, such as choice in lifestyles and choice in birth. Some of our choices are protected, others are contested. Remarkably, our notions and principles of freedom are still being developed. And that is costly, too. It's not easy being free.

Free societies must protect human or civil rights. We have certain rights as individuals, as well as communal rights. Balancing and maintaining these is a costly affair. Sometimes we go to war to protect them, proving again the appropriateness of the bumper sticker.

The attraction of living with these rights and freedoms has caused frequent population relocations. Jews have repeatedly immigrated to places that welcomed them and protected their communal life.

Freedom of religion is one of these decisive motivations. We in Canada are free to practise religion. What does that mean? It means we are free from coercive religion. No one can force us to participate in any system. (Though they can legislate language.) Freedom of religion confers on us the right to practise our own brand of religion. We can't coerce others, nor interfere with them. But we can believe in our own way. We are free. Keeping that alive is crucial.

Significantly, free societies rely on the responsibilities of their citizenry. It's our job to be vigilant, to exercise our freedoms and take on the responsibilities that good citizenship requires. Freedom of speech doesn't permit hateful or damaging speech. It's a responsibility that requires caution and guardianship.

Freedom is priceless, yet fragile, a great blessing that requires costly maintenance.

Remembering our friends

Last month, I meditated on tombs and the attempt we make to memorialize past heroes and ancestors. I had no inkling that only a couple of weeks after the column appeared, I would experience first hand how some people remember friends.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It happened like this. Along with other women of our community, I volunteer weekly at a Downtown Eastside drop-in shelter and safe house for women. These are women often afflicted with drug and alcohol addictions, and they pay for their habits – as well as the bread they eat – by prostitution. They are frequently homeless, often beaten and abused by boyfriends, pimps, clients. Their lives are far beyond our usual daily life experiences, but somehow they carry on. They are daughters, sisters, mothers, and our safe house gives them dignity, a warm meal and a few hours of respite from the cruel street. They come to our centre hungry, thirsty and bruised in body and spirit.

Since I have been with the centre, many women I saw weekly have died. Their memorial evenings sometimes take place at the centre, and their photographs are posted to notify others that they have gone. There was Peggy, who had been clean and sober and working, who died quietly in her sleep; another who died after a battle with AIDS; and others, too many others, dead long before their time. (All names are changed, of course.)

One of the women – I will call her Bella – has been a participant since I began volunteering. She always had a smile. I never saw her angry or desperate, even though she struggled with addiction.

Last week, I found her picture on the wall: dead of cancer before her 50th birthday. And then a shock - Bella had been buried at the Jewish cemetery. I had known she was Jewish, but she seemed not to want to be approached about it, so I respected her wishes. If I had known she was ill – but these events are usually known only to staff and the women's close friends. Had I known, I would certainly have visited her.

A small memorial service was held that evening at the centre, and I went to hear how her friends would remember her. There would be a second memorial held the next night with tapes of her singing and someone reading her poems.

But this evening was for the centre women. They lit candles and talked about Bella. How one of the women had first taken her in when she found Bella beaten and bleeding on the street. How Bella was always eager to show her poetry and have it published in the centre newsletter put together by the women; how she always had a smile. How beautiful her voice was when she sang. How she, in turn, had given comfort and care to a woman who was regularly beaten by her "husband."

There were darker stories. Bella had been brusquely warned off when she tried to play with a child in the local park. She had fought off the cancer once, only to have it return and claim her life.

How will we remember Bella? There will not be a great memorial for her. I can add her to the list of graves I visit twice a year at the cemetery. This year, when we recite Yizkor at Yom Kippur (in my own mind I call it the "Great Yizkor"), I can add Bella to the dialogue I have with friends and family now dead, a short memorial to Bella. It might go something like this:

"Bella, we tried not to fail you, but maybe we did. Your Jewish soul will not go without those to mourn you. I hope your family is remembering you from better times. I saw you in the bad times, but you always had a smile and, I know now, a song and a poem to keep you company. And you had friends who will miss you. You will not be forgotten."

On a different note: I know that King David's putative tomb is not on the Mount of Olives, as I wrote last column. The shrine is located on Har Zion. So I correct myself and apologize.

Religion in the news

In a previous article, I wrote about the pervasiveness of religion as a dominant theme in the modern public affairs agenda. Recently, I decided to survey the print media to determine how much of a role religion plays in the major issues facing the public today. Arbitrarily choosing July 24, I examined the stories reported in the Globe and Mail and the National Post, our two so-called secular "national newspapers."

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The National Post published an article concerning the Vision TV broadcasting of lectures by a fundamentalist from Pakistan who advocated a global jihad that would include the "extermination" of Jews.

One column focused on the training of Afghan police by Canadians as part of our mission in that country and, in that context, discussed the aggressive threats and actions of the Taliban, the fundamentalist sect of Sunni Muslims fomenting violence and oppression in Afghanistan. A different article dealt with the death of 35 Islamic insurgents in Pakistan.

Another story described the secular status of the political dynamics in Turkey in light of the recent elections. It reported that the "victory means fewer religious restrictions in public life, such as the ban on headscarves at university… and the separation of mosque and state."

There was a widely reported story about the government of Canada's restoration of monetary aid to the Palestinians. Because of the religious underpinning of Mideast politics, these issues do not involve international politics only.

And in the "Ideas" section, there was a large article dealing with the historical influence of preacher Aimee Semple McPherson.

The last page of the news section featured three significant stories: one from Bahrain on the abaya or traditional covering for women required by Islamic teachings; another from the Balkans on the possibility that "resolving Kosovo's status could inflame the ethnic and religious passions in the most unstable corner of Europe"; and yet another from Riyadh concerning how some Saudis are investing in a Saudi prince's company despite religious edicts warning that this could violate the Islamic ban on usury and liquor.

The National Post also contained an editorial on the Vision TV broadcasts, as well as five letters to the editor related to such topics as the Taliban, atheism, Vision TV and a response to an earlier letter concerning original sin and the Bible.

The Globe and Mail covered some of the same stories that day, but also carried articles on a number of additional issues. There was a story about the Ontario plan to fund so-called faith-based schools.

There was also an article about U.S. casualties incurred in fighting against the Taliban in Afghanistan. Similarly, in another report concerning gunmen in Iraq and the war between the United States and Iraqi troops, there was mention of the "Shiite-dominated parliament" of Iraq.

There was a story from Islamabad about the reopening of the Red Mosque after more than 100 persons died in fighting between Islamic militants and security forces. And another article described how the "fashion police" in Tehran arrest men with western haircuts as well as women who dress "inappropriately." There was also an editorial concerning the recent Turkish election and its effect on both secular and Islamic elements in that country.

On a lighter note, the lead entertainment story related to the singer Prince and his mastery of "God and sex."

What does all this tell us? Although we live in a secular world, religious issues influence local, national and international events – and not always for the better. Organized religion should be a source of harmony, well-being and peace. Religion should promote and protect human rights rather than being used as an excuse to foment hate and attack those not sharing a particular ideology. There has been too much suffering in the name of God.

At the same time, the possibility that religion can unite people, bring out our best instincts and lead to a better world is a hope and a promise yet to be fulfilled. Only then will religion occupy the world's attention in the positive light that it deserves.

This was a not a scientific study, but I hope the above survey will increase readers' awareness of the prominence of religious-based stories in our media and the impact of religion on all aspects of life.

The Kirshner File

Arab-Israeli conflict has preoccupied Washington

As I was saying last week in the first part of my review of Michael Oren's superb work of popular history, Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East 1776 to the Present (W.W. Norton), the role of the United States in that volatile region has undergone a sea change since the 19th century. For a long time, the Middle East was on the back burner of U.S. foreign policy concerns, but the Ottoman massacre of Armenians in World War I and the allure of Arab oil markedly altered Washington's perceptions.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The United States sat back as the main colonial powers, France and Britain, formed League of Nations mandates in Palestine, Iraq and Jordan after the end of World War I in 1918. But Washington was not so passive as the scramble for oil got under way.

Intent on breaking Europe's stranglehold over Mideast oil, the United States, in 1921, corralled the seven major American petroleum companies into a consortium.

After striking it rich in Bahrain, the Americans sought, and received, a royal concession to prospect for oil in Saudi Arabia, a development that Oren describes as "a turning point in America's relations with Arabia." By 1939, Saudi wells had become indispensable.

The conflict in Palestine would soon engage American presidents, starting with the president, Woodrow Wilson. In May 1917, six months before the Balfour Declaration was issued, he expressed his admiration for a "legally secured homeland for the Jewish people in Palestine."

The secretary of state, Robert Lansing, however, was opposed to that pronouncement.

During the 1930s, when isolationism was in vogue, the United States clung to neutrality as the crisis in Palestine escalated. To the Americans, Palestine was a British problem.

In May 1942, American Zionists, for the first time, explicitly endorsed Jewish statehood rather than autonomy. To most Americans, the Mideast was still terra incognita, Hollywood films such as Casablanca and Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves notwithstanding.

At the height of the Holocaust, King Saud of Saudi Arabia sent president Franklin Roosevelt a memorandum denouncing Zionism. In response, Roosevelt pledged that the United States would take no position on Palestine without first consulting the Arabs. He repeated that promise after conferring with King Saud aboard the cruiser Quincy in the Great Bitter Lake in Egypt.

Roosevelt's successor, Harry Truman, was caught on the horns of a dilemma. Should he listen to the State Department and the Pentagon and reject the idea of a Jewish state? Or should he trust in American idealism and endorse it?

Diplomats and generals had told Truman that Jewish statehood would sow instability, increase Soviet influence and jeopardize oil supplies. But the plight of Holocaust survivors languishing in Europe and in camps in Cyprus, combined with the persuasive rhetoric of Zionist lobbyists, gave him pause.

Truman placed his administration behind the United Nations 1947 partition plan, but then, to the shock and outrage of Zionists, voiced support for a trusteeship for Palestine. In a startling volte face reflective of divisions in Washington, Truman shifted his position yet again and finally backed partition.

The United States recognized Israel, and Ralph Bunche – the first African-American to earn a Harvard PhD – facilitated armistice agreements between Israel and its Arab neighbours.

Surveying the political landscape in the wake of Israel's War of Independence, Oren says that the United States faced "agonizing choices."

On the one hand, it could continue supporting Israel and face the wrath of the Arabs. On the other, it could stand with Britain and France to stave off Soviet encroachments and coddle Arab nationalists. Adopting a middle-of-the-road position, Washington initiated a dialogue with Egypt's new military regime – which would soon be headed by Gamal Abdel Nasser – but played a role in overthrowing Iran's leftist Mossadegh government and replacing it with the pro-western Pahlavi monarchy, which lasted until 1979.

Oren is critical of the Eisenhower administration for siding with Egypt and its ally, the Soviet Union, during the 1956 Suez war.

Claiming that this policy backfired, he argues that the United States earned contempt from the Soviets, acrimony from the French and British, and antagonism from many Arab quarters.

Thanks, in part, to the support of the Jewish community, John Kennedy – the first Catholic president – squeaked out a victory. Kennedy was openly friendly toward Israel and sold the Israelis Hawk ground-to-ground missiles, thereby setting a precedent for U.S. arms sales to the Jewish state.

But in private, he rejected the claim by the prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, that Israel was developing nuclear power for merely peaceful purposes and urged him to settle the festering Palestinian refugee issue.

Lyndon Johnson's support of Israel "scarcely wavered," particularly after the Six Day War. Oren notes that Israel's triumph persuaded even skeptics in his administration that Israel was a useful Cold War ally.

Johnson sold the Israelis 150 Skyhawk and Phantom jets and completed the historic process of replacing France as Israel's principal arms supplier.

Richard Nixon's support of Israel stemmed from Washington's rivalry with Moscow. He and his second secretary of state, Henry Kissinger, believed that if Israel felt secure, it would take greater risks for peace.

In fact, the hawkish Israeli prime minister, Golda Meir, missed a golden opportunity in 1971 to make peace with Egypt. Oren's examination of Nixon's policy during and after the Yom Kippur War is incisive.

The Gerald Ford interregnum was notable for the separation-of-forces agreements that Kissinger hammered out between Israel, Syria and Egypt.

But there was also a crisis in Washington's bilateral relations with Israel. When the Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, initially refused to withdraw from the Abu Rodeis oilfields in the Sinai Peninsula, Ford grimly announced a "reassessment" of American policy in the region.

Oren's tone in describing the Jimmy Carter era is somewhat snarky. To give Carter his due, he worked tirelessly to promote the 1978 Camp David accords and Israel's 1979 peace treaty with Egypt. He was also ahead of the curve in recognizing the "legitimate rights" of the Palestinians and pledging to negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization once it accepted United Nations Resolution 242.

Ronald Reagan's relationship with Israel was complex, says Oren. He "revered" Israel but regarded oil as a paramount interest.

George Bush, the father of the current president, supported Iraq to contain Iran, but then attacked Iraq and convinced Israel to stay out of the Gulf War.

Bill Clinton strove mightily to settle the Arab-Israeli dispute through the Palestinian and Syrian tracks, but failed.

In closing, Oren lists American achievements and setbacks in the Mideast and foresees huge "collisions" pitting the West against Islamic radicals and the U.S. against Iran.

Despite these "cataclysms," he adds, the U.S. will not shy away from the Middle East and will try to preserve its dominant position there.

In other words, one should expect still more interesting times in the Middle East, a region of importance to the United States.

Israeli medical fellows, residents meet in Toronto

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The Canadian chapter of the Israel Medical Association recently welcomed Israeli medical fellows and residents to Toronto with a barbecue.

"Our main goal is to make them feel welcome, to know that as physicians here they can turn to someone," said association president Rose Geist.

The Israel Medical Association (IMA) is a professional organization for physicians with 39 international chapters.

The barbecue, on July 26 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, allowed residents and fellows to meet not only one another but also their families and children.

Zulma Tovar-Spinoza is in the middle of her second year of a fellowship. Last year, she completed a year of neurosurgery at the Hospital for Sick Children; this year she is focusing on epilepsy.

She said that with the help of the IMA, the fellows and residents feel connected. They mainly live in the Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue area, which, she said, they call "the kibbutz."

"We share more than our professional lives, we share daily lives. We play in the playground."

Tovar-Spinoza moved to Toronto from Petah Tikvah with her husband Yosef, mother Julia and three young sons, Ari, Hai and Eitan.

She said she and her family love Canada. "Even in winter," she said. She does not know where they will live once her fellowship is over.

Tovar-Spinoza said it is important for the whole Jewish community to be aware of the medical fellows and residents who uproot themselves to come to Canada because they need a lot of support, not only economically but socially as well.

Her husband, Yosef, works as an agronomist for a Canadian company. But Tovar-Spinoza said that many spouses of medical fellows and residents don't work and can often be very lonely.

The barbecue was her first event with the IMA, and she plans to get more involved in the future.

"I think it's a big effort – it's such a good idea to let the Israeli fellows know [about each other]. It's such a big step coming here."

The Canadian chapter of the IMA has 220 members, all physicians. It organizes events and lectures throughout the year, and also has some scholarships and grants to promote medical study in Canada and Israel.

"The goal is to encourage the collaborative spirit between Israeli and Canadian physicians and foster opportunities for students of medicine to go back and forth," said Geist, who is the director of the child and adolescent medical psychiatry department at the Hospital for Sick Children.

The next IMA event is a dinner lecture on Oct. 11 about postpartum depression and major depressive illness.

Sackett favours action against Iran

Speaking of Iran's nuclear ambitions and its president's threats to destroy Israel, Sackett observed, "Israel cannot afford even a single nuclear attack. Therefore, we will have to act to deter the possibility of a nuclear attack. We can only rely on ourselves."

He said that Israel has a choice: it can try to knock out Iran's nuclear installations militarily or attempt to destabilize the Iranian government.

"In any case, we will not ignore the threat."

In closing, Sackett said Israel has strayed from the path of righteousness.

"We have been on the wrong road map for a long time. Suicidal concessions [and] appeasement of terrorists all lead to death and destruction. Only a leader who has Jewish values can change [Israel's] direction. With God's help, Manhigut Yehudit will win, and once again Israel will be a light unto to the nations."

JTS student receives fellowship in pastoral care

Deborah Miller
[Frances Kraft photo]

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Deborah Miller, a rabbinical student at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, spent three summers as a volunteer at Baycrest doing "a lot of friendly visiting."

This summer, she was back at the long-term care facility two mornings a week as part of a 400-hour clinical pastoral education (CPE) program that ran from April 30 to July 20. Now she is completing an additional two weeks at Jewish Family and Child's hospice program doing home visits.

The program also includes students doing master's degrees in divinity at the University of Toronto. Some of the other rabbinical students in Miller's JTS class – all of whom must take, at minimum, a basic pastoral skills class – are doing similar programs in other cities, including Vancouver. Their time is divided between visiting patients and talking about what they are learning.

Miller – a 26-year-old Toronto native who attended Associated Hebrew Schools and William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute before receiving her bachelor's degree in public affairs and policy management from Carleton University – was chosen to receive this year's Harold Wolfe and Phyllis Flatt Families Fellowship.

The fellowship – a partnership with JTS, the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care and the Toronto Institute for Pastoral Education – is in its second year of funding a JTS rabbinical student who is Canadian or has strong ties to Canada, to complete the pastoral care program. Last year it was given to Montrealer Jarrod Grover.

Miller has a family affiliation with Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, a traditional Conservative congregation whose rabbis have been completely supportive of her decision, she said.

Although she had no major lifestyle change to adjust to for her future career – she grew up keeping kosher and Shabbat – she had to learn synagogue skills that are used only by men at Beth Emeth.

Miller's decision to become a rabbi was sudden but deeply felt. She was in Israel as part of the leadership program Otzma and was "literally having a conversation crossing the street" when she was struck by "the need for female spiritual leadership."

In addition to spending time at Baycrest with the palliative care unit, Miller is also part of the "spiritual care team" at Toronto Western Hospital, Princess Margaret Hospital and Toronto General Hospital. She serves patients from a wide variety of faiths – not just Jewish – and has been with some of them at the moment of death.

Sharing intense and meaningful moments with patients is "pretty huge," she said. "It definitely reinforced that I want chaplaincy to be a part of whatever rabbinate I end up with.

"It's really incredible to be with people in times when they're really struggling, or in times of great joy, or reaching some level of peace or security."

However, she noted, because of the intensity of the experience, she has to be "prepared to be open with myself" and to explore what it is going to evoke in her.

To avoid burnout, she finds that prayer is "super-important." As well, she works out several times a week and keeps a journal that has become an important part of her life.

Often, she finds, patients just want someone to talk to, particularly before surgery or at the end of their life. In other instances, she might recite psalms or "spontaneous prayers." A translation of the Misheberach, the Jewish prayer for healing, offers "a lot of what people are looking for," she has found.

For patients seeking answers to tough questions, Miller said she is "pretty honest about not having answers. A lot of times I can be the opportunity for them to have the conversation. A lot is the emotion behind it."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

A contemporary parable

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

Rabbinic Reflections

I recently received an e-mail from a good friend of mine encouraging me to watch a video clip on You Tube filmed in Kruger National Park in South Africa.

It's one of those amazing moments captured on film by some amateur photographers. A baby water buffalo taking a stroll with his family is attacked by a group of hungry lions that chase away the older water buffaloes and keep their prize, the baby. After a tug-of-war with some menacing crocodiles in a water hole, the lions finally sit down for their feast. To their surprise, however, the water buffaloes return with their family and friends. The buffaloes surround the lions with amazing symmetry, and after a dramatic fight, they succeed in saving their baby through teamwork and unity.

When I saw this film clip, I found myself intuitively cheering on the buffaloes and identifying with them – not only because they were the underdogs and we as Jews can relate to that, but because I was impressed by their strong sense of family and community, which I learned exists even among animals.

The buffaloes did not give up and abandon their child but came back with their entire community to save him. This amazing commitment to their child against all odds resonated within me very deeply.

I believe that we have a lot to learn from the animal kingdom. This story has an amazing message for the Jewish community in the 21st century.

The single greatest challenge that the community faces today comes from the vicious forces of assimilation. Like hungry lions, they are preying on our youth with great zest. The forces of assimilation are actually made up of many diverse sub-categories (crocodiles) that are tirelessly eating away and robbing us of our most precious commodity… our children. Missionaries, cults, intermarriage, ignorance and anti-Semitism are just a few of the "crocodiles" that are preying on our children on campuses around the world, in the streets and in the workplaces. In fact, according to most recent statistics, forces of assimilation are unfortunately succeeding in robbing us of our children in staggering numbers!

How do we counter such formidable forces that threaten the very future of our people?

First of all, like the water buffalo, we must never give up on our children. No child must be left behind to be devoured by the "lions and crocodiles" of assimilation. Then, like the buffalo, we must pool together all of our community resources to save our children.

What does this mean in practical terms? Basically, we cannot rely anymore on the efforts of individuals and outreach groups alone to change the tide of assimilation. While the valiant and heroic efforts of individual people and groups are praiseworthy and extremely successful, they are still falling short of averting the looming spiritual catastrophe threatening the very future of our people.

Only through the collective efforts of absolutely every member of the entire community will we succeed. We must draft every single Jew who cares about the future of our people in order to succeed in saving the Jewish people.

As the Lubavitcher Rebbe once said: "Every Jew who knows the Hebrew letter 'aleph' has the responsibility to teach 'aleph.'" Only when we all become outreach workers will we succeed. Like the buffalo, we must go back and call our friends, every one of them, to join in our efforts to save our children now!

Shivah 101

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

As a rabbi, I've obviously made many shivah calls. I go as a "professional," and I was taught the formulas to say. But I have also been a mourner myself and have been the "support system" for my husband when he was a mourner, and in those personal experiences, I've had a chance to watch the way others pay a shivah call.

Here's what I've learned: it's a special skill to comfort the bereaved. Unfortunately, we are mostly uncomfortable and awkward. Some of us avoid the whole thing. We let our own baggage get in the way – our fears, old hurts and resentments (did they pay a shivah call to me?), our own losses and the painful memories that paying a shivah call to someone else bring out. The skill needed to make a shivah call is to let go of ourselves and simply support someone else.

Here then is "Shivah 101" drawn from my own experiences of loss and the wonderful ways in which people supported us:

Go, even if you didn't know the deceased or aren't a close friend or family of the mourner. If you are a colleague from work or the shul, or a next-door neighbour, go, even if just for a short visit. The mourners want to know that they are still alive and that they still matter, and that "the community" cares – not just their own small circle.

Go during the second half of shivah. "Everyone" will go in the first few days, and the crowds thin out later in the week. If you went to the first big minyan, the mourner may not have even seen you, and you didn't get a chance to talk. Go again at the end.

Go during the day. Days are long and lonely. Kids may be in school, and other relatives back at work. It's during the day that the quiet is felt more keenly.

If there is a morning minyan, go then. It's harder to rouse people for a visit at 7 a.m. than at 7 p.m.

Sponsor a meal. Lunches are a wonderful time to serve the mourners yourself and lend a listening ear while they reminisce or just feel blue or overwhelmed.

Ask about the deceased. The mourners don't have to make conversation or may not feel like talking, but chances are they will want to speak about the person they just lost more than about work or the latest gossip or the news.

Don't "send condolences" through another person. Pick up the phone or send a card yourself. Are we really so busy that we can't take five minutes for a quick call?

Obviously, a tragic death is harder than an expected one or than dying at a ripe old age. In the case of a tragic or sudden death, don't ask the mourners, "How are you?" They feel terrible, but they also feel pressured to tell you they are just fine. Ask instead what you can do to help, or sit and hold their hand in silence and let them cry.

Is there ever a "good time" to lose someone you love? Is life ever really long enough? There is always one more simchah, one more seder their loved ones wanted them to attend. It's comforting to the mourners to hear that they were blessed to have this person for so long, but we should never intimate that it was "long enough."

Judaism is a religion of skill, and people get nervous about performing a mitzvah if they think they don't know how. But paying a shivah call goes beyond knowing the Hebrew formulas. It goes to the heart of being a friend and a member of a caring community.

Rolling the dice

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The accusations against a National Basketball Association official in a recent gambling scandal have highlighted the potential problems gambling may present to the integrity of professional sports.

Judaism has always looked askance at gambling. It is viewed as an activity that does not contribute to society's welfare. Nothing is produced except for an artificial transfer of wealth. While Jewish law disqualifies only professional gamblers from testifying in a court of law – as by dint of their profession, they "are not involved in the settling of the world" (Sanhedrin 24b) – all forms of gambling are frowned upon.

Gambling should not, however, be confused with risk-taking. While investing in the stock market may be a "gamble," the market itself serves a crucial economic function, and participating in it presents few ethical pitfalls, even though one is "betting" on which way the market will move.

In today's complex economy and with different modes of fundraising, the issue of gambling has become much more nuanced. Ontario and Nevada have legalized gambling on which thousands of jobs depend and which raises millions of dollars for government coffers. While one could advance many arguments against the legalization of gambling, most of them – such as potential addiction, loss of one's capital, family stress, criminal elements - are not intrinsic to gambling per se, and while important, do not necessarily render recreational gambling prohibited.

While the activities inside the casinos may be of little merit, one cannot honestly argue that they serve no useful function, at least after they have been established. Perhaps one can now argue that for recreational purposes, one would be allowed to visit such a casino. Is a night at the slot machines much different from spending money on a sporting event? Both spectator sports and gambling contribute little from a moral perspective, but in addition to generating important economic activity, they provide an evening of relaxation and fun, something which (in moderation) is most necessary and worthy from a religious perspective.

Even less problematic is participation in the myriads of government-sanctioned lotteries. While some rabbinic authorities have prohibited them as a form of inappropriate gambling, the generally accepted view is to allow people to purchase a lottery ticket. This is due to the fact that most of the monies go to support all kinds of permissible and even laudatory activities, be they educational or recreational initiatives.

It is hard to find a Jewish institution worth its weight that does not have some kind of fundraising lottery. In addition to the benefit for the sponsoring organization, most people who purchase such tickets do so more to support the institution than in the hope of winning – thus rendering it more like a donation and less like gambling.

Religious organizations must, however, also be concerned with the type of message they may be sending when they raise money. Thus a halachic authority, Rav Moshe Feinstein, in attempting to find a balance between raising funds and the appropriate role of a synagogue, ruled that a bingo fundraiser could be sanctioned if it was not held on synagogue premises.

Jewish law demands that for an agreement to be binding, there must be full consent. As all understand that games of chance are just that, there is an acceptance that one can easily lose, and therefore, such consent is present. Thus, regardless of the moral implications, such gambling losses are legally enforceable. However when you rely on skill, i.e. betting that I will beat you at chess, that consent may very well be missing, since you are only betting because you "know" you will win. Thus collecting such winning may run afoul of the prohibition of theft.

Jewish genealogy – Pt. 2

The Jewish Highway

Last time we looked at the multi-faceted website JewishGen: The Home of Jewish Genealogy, the place to go online when you are starting to research your Jewish roots. [jewishgen.org] As good as JewishGen is, it can't do the genealogy job alone. Today, the best of the rest.

Your first stop should be at the website of Winnipeg's Louis Kessler, whose love of genealogy began as he puts it, "Fairly abruptly. At my cousin Edith's house in 1974, with an out-of-town relative there from Los Angeles, a few of the cousins started piecing together a small chart of how the family was related. The nine Braunstein brothers and sisters (that included my grandfather) were scrawled onto a napkin. That was it! I was hooked." Along the way, Kessler has learned a great deal and lucky for us, shares his knowledge on his website. [lkessler.com]

Kessler's Jewish Genealogy Links may not be the most exhaustive list you'll find on the web. But what makes it an invaluable resource is that he has annotated his links with helpful comments. As well, he cleverly codes sites into categories such as News, How to, Tool, Data, Files and Links. Elsewhere on his site, he provides mini-reviews of the best commercial genealogical software available, as well as information and a trial download of his own genealogy software program, titled Behold. [lkessler.com/gplinks.shtml]

In hindsight I shouldn't have been surprised, but I have never seen as fastidious a bunch of website creators as genealogists. And for sheer tenacity, I have to give full marks to Ted Margulis and his Jewish Web Index. His genealogy page has practically every bit of information you could look for – and more. Just be forewarned – when I decided to make a hard copy of his offering, my printer was still working on overdrive 100 pages later! [jewishwebindex.com/genealogy.htm]

On the other end of the scale, Avotaynu.com offers what it calls the Five Minute Guide to Jewish Genealogy Research. That's where neophytes can get a crash course on the basics. [tinyurl.com/yrgd3a]

With branches around the world, the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies is the governing body. [iajgs.org] Founded in 1988, it organizes an annual get-together (recently in Salt Lake City, next year in Chicago); a Jewish genealogy month – the next one is in Cheshvan (October-November 2008); and puts out the annual Jewish Genealogy Yearbook. You can download the latest one free to find out who's who and what's what in the world of genealogical research. [tinyurl.com/276hkz]

As well, the association publishes a code of ethics that addresses sensitive genealogical issues such as the right to know versus the right to privacy. Its recommendation: data more than 75 years old should be available without restriction. "More recent data should be evaluated in the light of sensitivities of the living versus the importance of disseminating information." As well, you'll find the Ten Commandments in Genealogy. Here are three:

- You should not claim expertise without appropriate training and accreditation.
- Family traditions must be interpreted with caution and only used as clues.
- Claims to exalt a family for increased status must be verified. [iajgs.org/ethics.html]

As for more specialized sites, at Sephardim.com, A Research Tool for Sephardic Genealogy, you'll find helpful links as well as other unexpected features such as a dictionary of almost 2,000 Sephardi names and a list of Sephardi family crests. [sephardim.com] Hebrew speakers shouldn't miss Genwiki, a rich resource at more than 500 pages. [genewiki.golan-law.co.il] And interestingly, the Israel Genealogical Society website is almost entirely in English. [isragen.org.il]

Closer to home, you can learn more about Jewish genealogy at local chapters in Toronto [jgstoronto.ca], Montreal [jgs-montreal.org], Ottawa [jgso.org], Hamilton [jgsh.org], Winnipeg [jhcwc.org], southern Alberta [tinyurl.com/27o56q] and British Columbia [tinyurl.com/27gsgy].

Happy hunting.

Breaking bread with Joel Hecker

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Joel Hecker, who for more than a decade has been an associate professor at the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in the Philadelphia area, visited his hometown of Toronto recently to lecture on his book, Mystical Bodies, Mystical Meals: Eating and Embodiment in Medieval Kabbalah, an erudite study published by Wayne State University Press of Detroit in 2005.

Hecker spoke to congregants of the Lodzer Centre in the Sheppard Avenue-Bathurst Street area recently during a Shabbaton convened in his honour. The next day he also spoke with The CJN at a local kosher restaurant – which seemed fitting, since his book, a revision of his doctoral thesis that took him five years to write, focuses on the meaning of food and the act of eating in medieval Kabbalah.

The kabbalists of 13th-century Spain "were interested in having contact with divinity," Hecker explained, "and they saw the commandments and rituals of Jewish law as providing media for living contact with God."

The kabbalists "had a mystical understanding that the Torah is not just dictated by God but is rather, from God's own being," he continued. "To use an example that might get me into trouble, it's almost as though, with the kabbalists, God was on the [psychoanalytical] couch for 40 years and what Moshe scribbled down was not just narratives and laws, but the very substance of divine life itself."

The Zohar, the central work of kabbalistic mysticism attributed to Shimon bar Yochai or Moses de Leon, "attempts to decode the Torah as well as rabbinical midrashim, as a means to decode what's going on in God's inner life," Hecker said.

"What that means is that there's a completely different attitude towards the Torah, which is seen not only as a book that tells us stuff but also as a manifestation of divinity."

All of the familiar rituals of Shabbat – lighting candles, making kiddush with an upraised kiddish cup, holding two challah loaves together, putting salt on the bread – were invested by the kabbalists with special meaning that drew them closer to God's holiness, he said. "Each one of these rituals is more than just following divine law or rabbinical law – each one now becomes an interaction with holiness and divinity itself."

Every element of the Shabbos table, right down to the white tablecloth, is laden with deep symbolic meaning that is meant to invoke God's holiness and bring it down to earth. The kabbalists associated elements of these rituals with various of the 10 sefirot that are said to be aspects of the inner workings of God, Hecker said as he explained each of the following elements in turn.

Lighting Shabbos candles: "The two candles correspond to zachor and shamor, which in turn correspond to tiferet and shechinah, which are the masculine and feminine aspects of God."

Washing the hands: "When we raise up our fingers for the blessing of the washing of hands, we are directing the 10 potencies that are within us towards the 10 sefirot."

The two challah loaves: "They are the representation of tiferet and shechinah. So when we bring them together, we are the shadchanim, the matchmakers for God, and we are bringing love – bringing together masculine and feminine, and in erotic terms, that's love – into the cosmos."

The white tablecloth: "We have a white tablecloth because the table is a symbol for the shechinah and this is her wedding. That's the theme of the Shabbos song Lecha Dodi. But it's not just tiferet or the masculine aspect of divinity that is marrying her, but the male kabbalists as well. The very physical approach of this white tablecloth, and sitting at this table, is an act of union with the shechinah."

The table as altar: "The table serving as an altar is an idea that's already instituted by the rabbis of the Talmud. The idea is to imitate and replicate Temple practices in the home. That's why salt is put on the bread and hands are washed for the Ha-moitsee. Even before the temple was destroyed, the Pharisees had instituted some of these practices. But once the Temple was destroyed, they took on more significance and there was a movement to create the home as a Temple in miniature."

Hecker readily acknowledged the similarity between some of these Jewish practices and what might be regarded as their counterparts within Christianity.

"If you're going to say the challah is the shechinah, and then you're going to eat it – I would say there are similarities [with Christianity]," he said.

"The main difference is that the kabbalists didn't have to deal with a God who is actually incarnate. There was never a tradition or belief that God had actually walked on this earth; their relationship to the symbolism was never entirely literal… In Judaism there is no doctrine of transubstantiation."

Naturally, the Birkat Hamazon, or blessings over the meal, is also infused with kabbalistic meaning, Hecker said. "It's composed of four blessings that correspond to the four letters of the Tetragrammaton. The point is that one is trying to draw God's blessing down. We're sending our prayers up and trying to draw God's blessing down into our world."

Cemetery rehab project furthers Polish-Jewish relations

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A few months after Moishe Gold got involved with restoring Jewish cemeteries in Poland, he found himself in his parent's birthplace – the Polish town of Ozarow – where a very symbolic discovery was made.

Unearthed from the layers of debris in the last vestiges of the former shtetl's Jewish cemetery was a headstone that bore the name of Gold's grandfather, for whom he is named.

"They cleaned it up and it looked brand new," recalled the Hamilton, Ont., resident.

"It's become somewhat of a famous story in Poland."

The initiative that brought Gold to Ozarow is the Poland Jewish Cemeteries Restoration Project (PJCRP).

Since 2001, the not-for-profit organization has successfully restored more than 15 cemeteries across Poland, with another 30 in the works.

Today, the group's most immediate goal is petitioning the German government to pay its "fair share" of the cost of restoring and maintaining the 1,200 to 1,400 Jewish cemeteries throughout Poland, which were largely destroyed by the Nazis.

The petition also seeks payment for fencing and memorializing the thousands of mass graves created by German forces during the Holocaust.

"The petition asks for the German government to take responsibility and pay their fair share of the costs, estimated at upwards of $200 million (US)," said Norman Weinberg, executive co-ordinator of the PJCRP.

"We're not asking the German government to pay it all, and I believe what their fair share is will be argued out at some point."

Many Jewish and Polish organizations – including the Jewish National Fund, B'nai Brith Canada, the Zionist Organization of Sao Paolo, Brazil, the city of Lodz, Poland, and the American Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists – have signed the petition.

Weinberg, who launched the initiative in 2001, is seeking to meet with the Polish American Congress shortly and then present the petition to the German government.

In addition to restoring the cemeteries, – which involves everything from rebuilding walls and monuments to restoring headstones – the PJCRP is also deeply committed to Holocaust education, as well as reconciliation between Poles and Jews.

For instance, in concert with each restoration, project donors also fund programs in local Polish high schools, where students write about such topics as Jewish history in their town, the Holocaust and Polish-Jewish relations.

"They begin to appreciate and understand this former population in their town which they have never known," Weinberg said.

"Over 3,000 essays have been written so far across Poland, with prizes awarded for many essays."

Another project launched in conjunction with PJRCP is Voices.

This Holocaust education endeavour involves students creating a book of "voices" that are intended to speak for the voices silenced by the Holocaust.

When Weinberg, Gold and 25 fellow Ozarower descendants went to the Ozarow cemetery for a dedication ceremony in 2001, they were greeted by more than 500 Poles, including local clergy and the mayor.

"Can you imagine what it was like to be driven by a full escort to the cemetery and have more than 500 Poles there welcoming us with flowers?" Gold asked.

"It was amazing, and they made us feel very welcome."

A documentary about the event, titled Return to Ozarow: Mending a Broken Link, made its world premiere at the Warsaw Jewish Film Festival in April 2004.

To find out more about the petition and the PJCRP, visit www.pjcrp.org or contact Weinberg, at nweinberg@pjcrp.com.

Israeli beit midrash brings new approach to study of Gemarah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Mendy Blank had been teaching Gemarah for more than a dozen years, but he says his heart wasn't in it until he began studying with Rabbi Tzuriel Weiner three years ago.

Rabbi Blank now teaches at Beit Midrash Ra'ava, the Jerusalem learning centre Rabbi Weiner founded in 2004. Rabbi Weiner's teaching methodology is unique, says Rabbi Blank. "It bridges the gap between the human being and the text."

A 44-year-old New Yorker who made aliyah 20 years ago, Rabbi Blank was in Toronto recently on behalf of the beit midrash, along with Tzvi Fisher, a 31-year-old former Torontonian and student at the beit midrash who is now its vice-director of development.

The language of Gemarah – the Torah commentary that is also known as "oral law" – is "very archaic, very technical… These things get in the way of understanding the deeper meaning," said Rabbi Blank, a former director of the overseas program at the hesder yeshiva in Shiloh and an alumnus of Yeshivat Sha'alvim. He has also taught at Israeli yeshivot, as well as at the high school level.

Rabbi Blank believes the issues surrounding the teaching of Gemarah are symptomatic of a "crisis" in religious Jewish education, which is based on Gemarah after about Grade 5. "Our whole educational focus is on Gemarah and kids don't see the relevance any more, and refuse to co-operate. How do the teachers manage these kids? This constant tension is a crisis."

Fisher, a father of two who has taught high school and post-secondary girls' classes, said, "Kids are frustrated [by Gemarah]… A lot of kids don't want to participate."

What Fisher does differently now in his approach to Gemarah is to "try and clear my mind of my past studies and past judgments and try and hear what the Talmud is coming to tell me, to listen to what is being said here. That's the first step."

Listening is key at the beit midrash, and it spills over from text study into life, says the rabbi.

In fact, the study of a chapter in Baba Batra that dealt with digging a hole next to a neighbour's well led to a discussion on ecology, a visit to a guest speaker on permaculture, and changes at the Beit Midrash itself. "We now compost, we don't use disposable plates. These things are real."

While Gemarah is the focus at the institute, it's part of a "pyramid" including Bible and Mishnah, he added.

Beit Midrash Ra'ava, which receives a small amount of funding from the Israeli government and the rest from private donors, operates out of the main synagogue of Givat Hamiftar, an area near Ramat Eshkol in Jerusalem.

The name "ra'ava" is the Aramaic word for "will," as in the words spoken before the ark is opened in synagogue: "Let it be Your will that we open our hearts to the Torah."

The institute caters to older students - age 23 and up – some of whom have recently finished their army service. The majority of the 30 full-time, advanced yeshiva students are Israeli, according to Fisher, an alumnus of Yeshivat Or Chaim and Sir Sandford Fleming Secondary School who categorizes himself as a "mixture" of different elements of Orthodoxy and "very chassidic, very Zionistic." Fisher's father was a cantor in Kitchener-Waterloo before moving back to Israel.

"Before studying this way, [the text] didn't touch me," said Fisher.

The institute, which also offers evening classes for the public, recently introduced a three-year, advanced teacher-training program accredited by the ministry of education in Israel, and is starting a satellite Gemarah study program in France.

Wanted: Jewish home for antique artifacts

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Albert Edelstein possesses four Jewish-themed electric light fixtures that he believes are antiques.

And he wants to help them find a new home.

The 81-year-old retired Toronto businessman and his wife, Ruth, came across one of the artifacts about 20 years ago, when they were shopping at an antique shop in the city.

About three years ago, Edelstein discovered the others through his own searches of local Jewish institutions.

The light fixtures, which are 33.54 by 13.34 centimetres, have a bronze or brass-looking appearance, and are made of intricate metal scrollwork with three golden Magen Davids across the front of each.

Though well-worn, the pieces all have an old-world look to them and are well preserved.

Edelstein has conducted numerous searches over the years in an effort to determine their origin, but to little avail.

"My [searches] initially led me to the old Ostrovitzker shul on Cecil Street," Edelstein told The CJN, as he brought out the fixtures for display at his home.

The Ostrovitzker congregation existed in the 1920s, eventually moving north to become the Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

According to Edelstein, Shaarei Tefillah representatives could not determine where or when his objects were made, either.

Though he's never had them appraised, Edelstein believes the pieces may be quite old and perhaps valuable, but all he's concerned about is that they find a new home, preferably in a synagogue.

He wouldn't venture a guess as to the fixtures' value, saying instead that he could only attribute sentimental value to the artifacts, having kept them in his home for years.

"I'd like to hear from someone if they can confirm [their] origins," he said. "Ideally, I'd like to donate them to a synagogue so they could be on display as a reminder of old-world symbols."

To help this along, Edelstein is investing some time and effort in seeing the pieces rewired to conform to modern electrical standards, and to having them restored back up to a nice sheen.

To date, all his efforts to contribute the heirlooms to local synagogues have been rebuffed.

"Everyone's response so far has been similar. 'They're lovely, but we don't have a place for them right now,'" Edelstein said.

Still, he hopes talk of his "finds" will spark an interest in synagogues and Jewish organizations, so that these precious pieces of Judaica can once again find their rightful place in full public view for the community.

Klein misrepresents her own argument on Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Naomi Klein (CJN, letter to editor, Aug. 2) would have a valid complaint about what was written in this column on July 5, "Klein's thesis on Israel is 'total rubbish,'" if she had accurately presented the facts of her case. But she did not.

In her letter, Klein badly distorts both her original argument and what was written about it here.

In her original article, she pointed to only one factor to account for the boom in Israel's economy since 9/11: "selling fences to an apartheid planet." By "fences" she meant "Israel's huge and expanding [arms] export business" – and especially its homeland security products.

"Israel has learned to turn endless war into a brand asset, pitching its uprooting and containment of the Palestinian people as a half-century head start in the 'global war on terror,'" Klein wrote. She argued that Israel is using the growth in its homeland security products "to lock in its occupied territories," to create "open-air prisons" in Gaza and the West Bank, even using the Palestinians there as "guinea pigs" – a way of field-testing devices of oppression for export to other "security states."

Klein painted Israel as a uniformly cruel militaristic state bent on wanton, sadistic torment of the Palestinians for profit, and strongly implied support for the boycott of Israeli academics, since "the country's universities [have been turned] into incubators for security and weapons start-ups."

Her thesis in that article couldn't be clearer: Israel's security/arms export businesses account for the recent growth in Israel's economy. She mentioned no other factors. For this reason, Jim Lederman, an expert on Israel's economy, said that Klein's thesis is "total rubbish." Among other things, he clarified that in 2006, the growth in the economy was primarily the product of a rise in imports, investment in fixed assets, and consumer spending. The lead in export growth was not taken by arms/security sales, but by civilian products, most notably pharmaceuticals, which grew by no less than 30 per cent, or $2 billion (US).

In addition, and contrary to Klein's argument, Lederman pointed out that the vast majority of high-tech start-ups are not related to Israel's defence/security sector.

Even the Economist magazine ("Israel's economy: Vigorous but vulnerable" July 28), while noting that Israel's defence industry has done well since 9/11, first mentions tax cuts and deregulation as being the driving factors behind its economic growth.

Anyone reading Klein's letter would have no understanding of what this column's complaint was all about concerning her article. In her letter, she blatantly distorts her article's own thesis, just as she distorted the truth there about the source of the growth in Israel's economy.

In her Aug. 2 letter, she writes: "I do not claim that defence and homeland security make up the majority of Israel's gross domestic product."

That was not what she argued in her article, nor what this column on July 5 objected to.

She continues: "I do demonstrate that they are some [emphasis added] of the fastest growing sectors in the Israeli economy." Again, this was not her argument in her article. In her original piece, she did not identify even one other sector of the Israeli economy as being responsible for the boom.

Klein may take exception to the way her original harangue was characterized in this column, but she should at least have had enough integrity to deal truthfully with what she actually wrote.

(In order to judge for themselves, readers may be interested in comparing Klein's Aug. 2 letter with her original article that appeared in the Georgia Straight on June 21. It can be found at www.straight.com/article-96202/israel-thrives-gaza-suffers. The original According to Reports column can be found at www.cicweb.ca.)

Doctor prescribes living your dream

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Dr. Samuel Gerstein says he has yet to meet a person who is unable to find out what he or she loves to do and pursue it as a career.

The emergency room physician and psychotherapist just published his first book, Live Your Dreams: Doctor's Orders.

The book focuses on the tales of 40 individuals who love their job despite what Gerstein labels the pervasive societal "myths" that stood in their way, such as being too old or not having enough money to do what they want to do.

Gerstein comments on each person's story to help readers draw lessons for their own lives.

"They've got to do the work," Gerstein told The CJN at his book's June 21 launch. "I'm not here to say, 'Here's your dream – next!' because they've got to find their own treasures."

After seeing the same patients return to the emergency room at the Humber River Regional Hospital time and again with different symptoms, Gerstein was motivated to look into the symptoms' causes.

He researched the correlation between physical illness and stress at work, which can lead to anything from chronic neck pain to asthma to heart problems.

"Our whole model is focused on how people get sick, and I said, 'That's not good enough.' I want to see how people get better," Gerstein said.

After realizing he was under stress at work himself, he put himself on a new path and focused on doing what he loved.

Part of that included taking classes, from adult education courses at the University of Toronto to public speaking with Toastmasters to improv lessons at Second City.

He also reduced his hours in the emergency room and opened a psychotherapy clinic. Today, he runs seminars about how to grasp your dreams and make them a reality.

Once he began to love his own work, Gerstein was determined to find other people who do as well.

After a long search, his first success story was Doug Sole.

Sole overcame stage fright and intense feelings of inadequacy to become a drum circle facilitator and professional speaker.

Sole, who owns Soul Drums, a North York percussion store, said he wants people to learn from his story in Gerstein's book.

"I hope they see through the obvious challenges that I went through that it's not something that you're going to get away from," Sole said at the launch.

"You are always your own worst enemy, but you can do whatever you want to if you focus, and spend the time."

Gerstein interviewed more than 100 people for his book, using a "dream career test" that he designed as a screening tool. The 40 stories he selected for publication were based on as wide a sampling of careers and people as he could find.

Gerstein's system focuses on four steps to self-improvement that he labels "possibility, possibility, probability and reality."

The first two steps are realized through the book – first, that it is possible to realize your dreams and explore them, and then that it's possible for you to do so.

Gerstein says that by reading his book, and through his practice, seminars or other work, people should be able to make their dreams a reality.

Gerstein is already working on a sequel to the book, what he calls a home study kit.

"I don't feel work-stressed now, and I love helping people, young and old, discover the truth of themselves," he said.

Israeli diplomat heads home for new posting

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — At the end of this month, Israeli diplomat Ofir Gendelman will be leaving Ottawa after four years in what originally had been an unexpected posting.

Gendelman, the second secretary at the Israeli Embassy, was headed to Toronto and had completed his pre-posting orientation for a Toronto placement when suddenly, two days before he was to leave Israel, he was told he was going to Ottawa instead.

"I had never been to Ottawa and had not prepared myself for a posting here, but after arriving here and finding how interesting the city is and how fascinating the federal political scene is… I was very happy," said Gendelman.

"The work here is more political than it would have been in Toronto and politics is what I love – by training I am a political officer."

There have been three prime ministers in Ottawa during Gendelman's time here. He arrived when Jean Chrétien was in office, then Paul Martin succeeded him, and now Stephen Harper holds the job.

Gendelman said Israel is grateful for the current Tory government's strong backing of the Jewish state.

"Of course, we are very appreciative of Prime Minister Harper's support," he said. "I am very privileged to have witnessed the positive change that we have experienced here, that I was able to play a part in strengthening the relationship between our two countries."

Gendelman noted the embassy was busy last summer when Canada played a major role in assisting Canadians who were stranded in Lebanon during Israel's war with Hezbollah.

"The war last summer definitely was a unique experience in that it gave me the opportunity to represent my country in a time of crisis, in a country that was also involved in the war through its expats in Lebanon," he said. "It was both a challenge and an achievement because people here were so interested in what was going on. There was a huge Canadian angle. We were working day and night with [Foreign] Affairs to help."

He added that the war "helped show Canada's commitment to peace in the Middle East and commitment to a fellow democracy that was attacked. [Israeli] Prime Minister [Ehud Olmert] was very, very appreciative of the friendship and support shown by Prime Minister Harper."

Gendelman has been working with the media and has increased the use of "new media" (Internet, e-mail, etc.) to get Israel's message out to a broader audience. The embassy now puts out two weekly publications – one political, one information/cultural – that are are available online.

"We encourage people to check these out and send them on to their friends and lists of contacts," he said. "We are using the Internet to expand our reach, to get people interested in what is happening in Israel behind the headlines while also updating them about political developments."

The website to access is www.embassyofisrael.ca.

Gendelman will be returning to his home in Herzliya with his wife and two young sons (one of whom was born in Canada), but he'll be commuting daily to his new position in Jerusalem, where he will become deputy director of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Arab media division. He will serve as Israel's spokesperson to Arab media outlets.

"I will always consider Ottawa as my second home. I made a lot of friends here," he said.

Book helps survivor process memories

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Many children who survived the Holocaust have never had the opportunity to piece together the fragments of their horrific memories.

Their loved ones tried to shelter them, feeling that children were too young to understand what they experienced. As a result, they carried with them painful, unanswered questions.

"When I was seven years old, my world came tumbling down, and throughout my life, the smallest thing triggers my anxiety and depression and leaves me helpless and paralyzed with fear," said 71-year-old, Hungarian-born Olga Verrall.

Her 244-page book, Missing Pieces: My Life as a Child Survivor of the Holocaust, was published recently by the University of Calgary Press' Legacies Shared series.

Her suppressed memories of the loss of her home, the loss of her most loved possession, the loss of her confidence that her parents could protect her, the vicious rape of her mother by a high-ranking SS officer, the suicide of her Jewish friend's family, and her transfer of fear from the Nazis to the Communists, all deeply affected her life in Canada.

Despite the love that she found in this country, the ghosts of Verrall's childhood manifested themselves in bouts of psychiatric depression and hospitalization.

Missing Pieces is her search for validation. She describes the pain she experienced here, as well as her courage to try to understand the source of her emptiness juxtaposed with feelings of joy and optimism.

Olga Verrall
Missing Pieces
My Life as a Child Survivor of the Holocaust

Verrall was born in 1936 in the small town of Szarvas, the fourth child after three boys, to Laszlo and Mariska Berger. Her father was a successful grain merchant, and her early years were idyllic and free of anti-Semitism.

"In 1944, we heard from people who escaped the Nazis what was happening, but for some time, my parents, grandparents and others could not believe it was happening," she said.

The day the Nazis came to remove the Bergers from their home was a pivotal experience in Verrall's life, and it shook her so badly that it still haunts her to this day, she said.

"I remember clearly that the German soldiers were waiting for us at the gate of our house. We could take only one possession, and I was carrying my doll Pani, who was always with me. I believe that my mother told me to go back to the house to get a jacket, as it was getting cold and I wanted to get something to cover my Pani," Verrall said.

"I placed Pani on a table at the gate and when I returned, Pani was gone and the soldiers were laughing. I broke down crying and screaming and said I wanted to die. At the age of eight, it was a most significant loss which affected my entire life."

Her family was taken to a ghetto in the spring of 1944. They were interned in the Auspitz labour camp.

"Our lives were saved when an acquaintance of my grandfather whispered into his ear that if the Germans asked if anyone had any skills, he should raise his hand," Verrall said. "My grandfather obeyed this man's instructions and subsequently, this definitely prolonged the lives of my family."

Her grandfather later died of starvation.

After they were liberated on April 13, 1945, the Berger family returned to Szarvas and later moved to Budapest. Under Communist rule, the family changed its name to Barsony to deflect attention from the fact they were Jews. She describes this part of her life as another time of persecution.

In 1957, she immigrated to Winnipeg, where other members of her family had already settled. Soon after, she met and married Orland Verrall, the cantor at Rosh Pina Synagogue. She said it was love at first sight.

Being the wife of a clergyman, the birth of their two daughters, Judy and Lesley, and an active communal life brought some contentment and security, but deep inside, insecurity and emptiness would erupt from time to time.

When her husband retired from the synagogue, the Verralls moved to Toronto. In 1992, her husband died and Olga again faced emotional trauma and felt a need to search for meaning and an understanding of her troubled childhood.

She took courses, organized a widows' and widowers' group at Beth Tzedec Congregation, and began doing volunteer work at Baycrest that she has continued.

Her search for understanding took her back to Hungary three times. On her third visit, she decided to begin documenting her childhood memories and their effect on her life.

For six years, Verrall painstakingly wrote the book by hand, chapter by chapter, as she looked for the missing pieces of her childhood.

She told The CJN that her early years have given her a deep sensitivity for children who suffer. "I have committed all the money collected from the sale of my book Missing Pieces to the Autism Spectrum Disorders Society of Ontario," she added.

From the smile on her face, it's hard to believe that Verrall lived a life of anguish.

"My life purpose is to smile. It makes people smile back. And I have learned that life is the greatest miracle."

Rabbi back in Manitoba capital after 20 years

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After 20 years in Ontario, Rabbi Larry Lander is coming home.

As of Aug. 15, Rabbi Lander will be the new spiritual leader of Congregation Etz Chayim, replacing the departed Rabbi Henry Balser, who has moved to a pulpit in Boca Raton, Fla.

Both Rabbi Lander and his predecessor had previous stints in Winnipeg.

In the early 1990s, Rabbi Balser was the rabbi at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in south Winnipeg, the city's largest and oldest congregation. He left there for a position in Chicago. He came back in 2001 to lead the Rosh Pina Synagogue in north Winnipeg.

The Rosh Pina was Winnipeg's second oldest congregation and second largest, but membership had been declining. In 2002, the Rosh Pina merged with the two other Conservative north Winnipeg synagogues (the Bnay Abraham and the Beth Israel) to form Congregation Etz Chayim.

Rabbi Balser's departure was by mutual consent, said Etz Chayim president Howard Kideckel (who is originally from Toronto).

He added that the decision not to renew the rabbi's contract came early in the year.

"It only took five months for us to find a new rabbi," Kideckel said, giving praise to the congregation's search committee. "Several members of our search committee have fond memories of Rabbi Lander when he served here 20 years ago."

For the incoming rabbi, coming back to Etz Chayim closes a circle. His first rabbinical position in 1986 was as junior rabbi at the Rosh Pina under the popular Rabbi Sholom Rappaport, who enjoyed a long tenure here.

Rabbi Lander said he always wanted to be a rabbi.

"As a boy, I loved sitting in shul listening to the words of the rabbi," he recalled. "I always wanted to be able to bring people closer to Torah."

Rabbi Lander's parents, Ralph and Marjorie, were originally from Winnipeg, but moved to southern Alberta after they got married. The future rabbi grew up in that part of the country, but noted that he has still has a lot of family in Winnipeg. He also earned his bachelor of social work at the University of Manitoba.

Rabbi Lander is a graduate of Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati.

He joined the Conservative movement nine years ago.

After Winnipeg, Rabbi Lander served congregations in Brampton, Ont., (for six years) and London, Ont. (for 11 years). For the past year, he had been working as a social worker for the Children's Aid Society of Toronto.

"I am looking forward to coming to Etz Chayim," Rabbi Lander said.

"The congregation has a great cantorial soloist in Tracy Kasner Greaves and fine staff. I am looking forward to bringing the congregation closer to Torah."

Kideckel said the board hopes the new rabbi can also attract more young people and younger families to services.

Rabbi Lander is also getting married next month. His bride is Arlene Davis of Toronto.

"We will be coming to Winnipeg right after the wedding," he said. "We will have our honeymoon here."

Aish HaTorah closes in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Aish HaTorah has quietly folded its tent in Winnipeg and departed after a seven-year run here, leaving ghostly reminders of times past on websites promoting rabbis who are no longer here and programs that are no longer being offered.

The Orthodox movement was established here by Rabbi Shimon Lesserson and his wife, Sarah.

Rabbi Lesserson, originally from New York, exhibited a real gift for promotion, marketing and networking. He established a "lunch and learn" program with sessions held in different law office boardrooms downtown. He also organized successful seminars and Shabbatons in Gimli, Man., and he built a loyal following of two to three dozen young families who would gather at the Lesserson home in Tuxedo on Saturday mornings for learning, prayer and a Shabbat lunch.

The couple left here reluctantly in June 2006, because their youngest child – still a baby at the time – had health problems. The family moved to Los Angeles, where Sarah's parents live, for access to specialized medical treatment.

Rabbi Daniel and Yaffa Klatzkow came to Winnipeg in January 2005, to assist the Lessersons. When the latter left, the former became the Aish HaTorah representatives in Winnipeg.

Rabbi Klatzkow kept a much lower profile, although he did have a regular study group composed of university students and he organized a trip to London, England, last December over the holidays for some of the students. He and Yaffa also organized a Shabbaton in Gimli in April.

And then they were gone. No one who was associated with the movement in Winnipeg seems to know why the Klatzkows left (reportedly for Boston) and whether there are any plans to have a new Aish HaTorah rabbi come here.

In response to an e-mail query, Aish representative Eric Coopersmith in Jerusalem said that "Rabbi Klatzkow had to unfortunately leave for personal reasons,which led to the closing of the Aish branch there [in Winnipeg]."

The room packed with hundreds of high school students grew silent as the baby-faced 5-foot-4 male stepped onto the stage. Sporting a T-shirt, jeans and his trademark Motivate Yourself bracelet, he held up a $20 bill and in a booming voice asked, "Who wants this?"

The audience cheered in unison.

He then crumpled the bill, threw it on the floor and began stomping on it. "I hate you! You're a failure! You'll never amount to anything!" Regaining his composure, he held up the bill again and asked who still wanted it. The students cheered even more loudly.

"Lesson number 1," said 26-year-old David Major. "No matter what I did to this bill, you still wanted it, because it still has the exact same value. As you go through your lives, people are going to stomp on you, tell you that you're not good enough, that you can't make it. But that doesn't mean you can't... You have to always remember to listen to the big voice up here [points to his head] that tells you that you can."

Major, a resident of Thornhill, Ont., is currently in his seventh year as a motivational speaker. He has performed across Canada, the United States and China, at high school assemblies, international leadership conferences, fraternities and sororities, and award banquets, entertaining and motivating more than 50,000 youths.

The youngest of two children, Major grew up in a Conservative Jewish home, with regular Shabbat dinners and community involvement. He feels his Jewish upbringing had some influence on his business. "With Judaism comes a sense of community and compassion, and that has influenced the way I conduct business," he said.

Major is also passionate about promoting tolerance among all people, and one of his speeches deals specifically with the issue of equality and inequality. "The anti-Semitism, racism and discrimination that I've observed in many capacities over the years has made me interested in discussing diversity issues and being as equal as possible when it comes to everything," he said.

"I think it's hard to find jobs like this where at the end of the day you feel like you have moved the world a step forward," said Major. "You're not just spinning your wheels doing a mundane job that needs to get done. You're actually making a positive impact on people. I always say in my speech, 'Be the change you want to see in the world,' and I think that's what I'm accomplishing."

Major isn't your average motivational speaker. He uses sound effects, monologues, rants and comedic messages in his speeches, always ensuring he engages with the audience. In former speeches, he performed the tune to Baa Baa Black Sheep with his armpits.

His schedule changes from week to week. Some months he's out on the road, hitting various speaking engagements, while others he spends most of his days in front of his computer at home, corresponding with students, educators and other business contacts.

Major also produces Student Leadership Activities Magazine (SLAM!), an online publication written by and for students. He aims to use the magazine as a medium to help create an online community through which students can share leadership ideas and learn from each other. He is also planning on writing a book on leadership.

Getting about 6 ½ hours of sleep a night, he tries his best to squeeze in quality time with his girlfriend, friends and family.

Major's first motivational speaking gig ensued by fluke when he was a Grade 12 student at Thornhill's Westmount Collegiate Institute. He and a few other students planned the first annual leadership conference at the school and wanted to bring in a motivational speaker. Unable to afford a professional, Major and his friend decided to give a mini-speech.

About a month later, another high school requested that Major and his friend present a speech for pay at a leadership conference. Surprised but flattered, Major and his friend jumped on the opportunity, and they garnered a standing ovation. Realizing they might have found a niche, they continued making speeches at various events.

After about a year, Major began doing motivational speaking on his own, part time, while studying political science and history at the University of Western Ontario.

"It's a really fulfilling job," said Major. "I love the e-mails I get from students after I make a speech, and it's great when I walk out of a school and about a dozen people are giving me compliments and thanking me for the speech. Some say I helped them see things in a different way or I really made an impact on them."

Eager to touch more lives in a positive way, Major planned to pursue his business as a motivational speaker full time following his graduation from university. But a few months after his return to Thornhill, he landed a job as special assistant for community outreach for Thornhill member of Parliament Susan Kadis after volunteering to help her run in a federal election.

So he eagerly took on that opportunity, but continued the motivational speaking work part time. Soon he was working 17 hours a day, seven days a week.

Last fall, realizing he had more passion for his work as a motivator than as an assistant for Kadis, Major decided to leave the political field and pursue his business full time. But he said working for Kadis was "the best thing that could have happened" to him. He learned a lot of the skills that he now better understands are crucial to running a successful business, including promotion and maintaining contacts.

Major said he also learned a lot throughout his high school experience that helped to shape who he is today. "I had changed so much every year in high school. In Grade 9, I hardly talked to anybody, was very shy and didn't have many friends. I loved to get up in front of a crowd and perform, but in social situations I felt awkward."

Major said that over the years, he gained confidence in himself and what he was doing. "I think it also helped me to see all sides of high school. That's one thing I want to add to my speech. When many teens see me now, they think I'm confident and an accomplished public speaker, but that wasn't always the case."

For others thinking of pursuing a career as motivational speakers, Major said it's important they enjoy the job, are willing to put in the hours needed to succeed, including travelling, and are okay with facing rejection. "You get rejected a lot more times in this job than you get accepted. You have to get a little bit of thick skin with it."

Start your summer meal with a cold soup

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Cold fruit or vegetable soups served as a starter to take the edge off a long, hot day have become the hottest must-try items in restaurants these days.

Cooking instructions for cold summer soups usually have no more than three or four steps – super simple. Fruits or vegetables are cooked to a soft consistency and left as they are or blended into a light purée. This purée is combined with a liquid, and sometimes the soup is thickened with flour, cornstarch or potato flour, or with beaten egg yolk added at the end. With the availability of non-dairy sour cream and yogurt substitutes, and "fake" chicken broths, most cold fruit and/or vegetable soups can be made to suit any meal.

You can use most fruits or vegetables for soup. Fruits like strawberries, raspberries, cherries, plums, gooseberries, apricots, blackberries and rhubarb work extremely well combined with water or a mixture of water, apple juice and a fruity white wine, a little lemon, some sugar, and flavouring like cinnamon, lemon peel or vanilla. You can mix and match flavours to create a delicious start to your summer meal.

Vegetable choices can include, among other possibilities, broccoli, cucumber, spinach and tomato. Combined with broth, seasoning and herbs, they are scrumptious, and perfect for anyone who prefers a savoury start to a meal.

Quick note: I always like to use slightly over-ripe fruit when I make these soups. The softer, slightly sweeter consistency lets me add less sugar.

COLD CHERRY SOUP

2 lb. fresh red cherries
2½ cups white wine
3 to 4 tbsp. sugar or to taste
½ tsp. cinnamon (optional) juice of 2 lemons
zest of 1 lemon (optional)
6 tbsp. cherry wine
1 cup sour cream, yogurt or non-dairy sour cream substitute

Remove the stems and pits and put the cherries in a saucepan with the wine, sugar, cinnamon, lemon juice and zest (because the flavouring depends on the taste of the cherries and the wine, use less sugar and lemon to start with and add more if necessary towards the end). Simmer for 15 to 20 minutes until the cherries are soft. Add the cherry wine and chill. Beat in the sour cream just before serving, or you can pass the sour cream and let everyone help themselves. Serves 6.

COLD BROCCOLI BISQUE

1¼ to 1½ lb. fresh broccoli or 2 10-oz. packages frozen, chopped broccoli
3½ cups vegetable, imitation or regular chicken broth
1 medium onion, quartered
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 tsp. salt
1 to 2 tsp. curry powder
dash pepper
2 tbsp. lime juice
8 lemon slices
½ cup sour cream, yogurt or non-dairy sour cream substitute
1tbsp. snipped chives

Put the broccoli in a pot. Add the broth, onion, butter, salt, curry powder and pepper. Bring the mixture to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, 8 to 12 minutes or until the broccoli is just tender. Place ½ broccoli and broth mixture in a food processor or blender. Cover and blend until smooth. Repeat with the other ½ of the broccoli and broth. Pour all the soup into a large bowl. Stir in the lime juice. Cover and refrigerate at least 4 hours. Pour the soup into bowls and top with lemon slices, then add spoon of sour cream and top with the chives. You can blend the sour cream in with the soup if you want a creamed soup. Serves 6.

COLD CUCUMBER SOUP

2 medium cucumbers
1 quart buttermilk
¼ cup finely chopped fresh parsley
2 tbsp. chopped onion
1 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
salt and pepper to taste
chow mein noodles or rice noodles

Peel and seed and coarsely chop the cucumbers. Place them in a processor and process until smooth, then put the cucumber purée into a bowl. Add the buttermilk, onion, ½ the parsley and ½ the dill. Mix to combine. Cover and chill for several hours. Before serving, stir to combine. Divide the soup between 6 bowls and garnish with the remaining parsley or dill and chow mein or rice noodles. Serves 6.

COLD ZUCCHINI SOUP

3 onions, chopped
2 tbsp. butter
2 lb. zucchini, chopped
3 cups vegetable or chicken stock
2 cups half and half or milk or non-dairy substitute
¼ tsp. nutmeg
fresh or dried parsley for garnish
salt and pepper to taste

In large pot, saute the onions in the butter. Add the chopped zucchini and onions. Cook for 2 to 3 minutes and then add the stock. Cook until the zucchini is tender. Remove from heat and cool slightly. Purée the mixture in a food processor or blender. Add the nutmeg and mix to combine. Place the mixture in a large bowl and cool for at least 30 minutes. Add half and half or milk and mix to combine. Add salt to taste. Cover and chill thoroughly. Divide the mixture between 6 bowls. Garnish with parsley and serve. Serves 6.

Cantorial student to lead New Orleans service

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

He may not be physically rebuilding the hurricane-ravaged city, but Jeremy Burko's upcoming trip to New Orleans will certainly be a mitzvah: he'll be leading High Holy Day services at an Orthodox shul near the city's historic Garden District.

The 25-year-old is heading into his third year of the five-year cantorial studies program at the Jewish Theological Seminary's Miller Cantorial School in New York.

During last March break, Burko toured New Orleans and performed with Pizmon, a Jewish a capella group comprising students from Bernard College and Columbia University, as well as JTS.

"It's not the same as getting into the rebuilding project ourselves, but we felt that, like entertaining the troops, it's part of the whole project," Burko said.

Jeremy Burko prepares to lead High Holy Day services in New Orleans.

Afterward, shul president Lonnie Schaffer asked Burko, the only cantorial student in the group, to return to the Big Easy in the fall to lead High Holy Day services.

Burko has extensive musical experience as a singer, composer and even conductor, but he has no experience leading High Holy Day services. His program only starts teaching how to lead prayers on Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur in the third year of study.

"I was shocked to say the least, but also intrigued," Burko said in a phone interview, his rich, full voice resonating.

"It's something that I can do personally for them. I'm not a rabbi, I'm a musician, and it's what I have to give."

Burko is excited about the upcoming challenge and has started working through High Holy Day liturgy. He also plans to study with a tutor.

Born in California, Burko grew up in Toronto and was in the middle of pursuing an engineering degree at the University of Toronto when he switched to music and Jewish studies.

He was actively involved with music all through his undergraduate years, writing and conducting full orchestral arrangements for the Alexander Singers, a community theatre group, and founding the U of T Varsity Jews comedy a capella group in 2001. He directed the group for five years.

Burko decided to pursue cantorial studies on the advice of a vocal teacher, who is Catholic.

He said that during his New Orleans performance with Pizmon, he performed one cantorial solo that he wrote himself.

The synagogue became aware of his cantorial background from his introduction at the start of the show, he added.

"[I'm looking forward to] being able to contribute something of my own for the effort," Burko said of his upcoming volunteer job.

"There's so much that needs to be done, and it's only something small, but it is the best way that I can contribute."

Olmert welcomes idea of peace conference and this is an opportunity that should not be missed," Rice told reporters before meeting Abbas.

Abbas' aides said he told Rice he was ready to draft with Israel a "declaration of principles" for final peace negotiations that would lead to the foundation of a Palestinian state. But Abbas' authority is effectively limited to the West Bank, after rival Hamas Islamists took over the Gaza Strip in a June coup.

Abbas burnished his reputation as a pragmatist by vociferously breaking with Hamas after the coup.

Olmert, his popularity hard hit by the setbacks of last year's Lebanon war, has advanced cautiously, approving moves to build up Fatah forces in the West Bank, while balking at the idea of binding negotiations on ultimate Palestinian statehood at this stage.

"Sometimes it is not wise to put the most sensitive issues first," Livni said at a news conference when asked about Abbas' desire to discuss final-status issues of borders, the rival national claims on Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

But Livni added that "Israel is not going to miss this opportunity. We are not going to miss the opportunity to promote dialogue with Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian government."

Faced with a weakened Abbas in the West Bank and the diehard hostility of Gaza under Hamas, Olmert has sought broader peace initiatives, invoking a Saudi proposal for comprehensive Arab recognition of Israel in exchange for its withdrawal from all territory captured in the 1967 Six Day War.

Though Olmert has frustrated the Arab world by voicing misgivings at the idea of a full pullout, the Saudis told Rice in Riyadh that they would be willing to attend an as-yet unscheduled peace conference that Bush wants to host in the fall.

"When we get an invitation from the minister to attend, when this takes place, we will discuss it and we will make sure that we attend," Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal said, referring to Rice. State Department officials said invitations had yet to be issued.

But the Saudi prince also said Israel must be willing to respond to "pressures" from the Arab world to make concessions in terms of territory and resolving the Palestinian refugee issue.

Olmert, who met Rice for dinner, welcomed the idea of the conference.

"This meeting can grant an umbrella for the bilateral talks between Israel and the Palestinians," his office said in a statement.

The sudden co-operativeness by Saudi Arabia may have come in response to Washington's decision to sell it billions of dollars worth of advanced weaponry as a bulwark against an ascendant Iran. Though details of a sale have not been released, it is estimated to be worth about $20 billion.

That deal, as well as boosted U.S. defence aid to Egypt, has stirred concern in Israel, but Rice made clear that the Bush administration remained committed to preserving the Jewish state's military superiority in the region. The Bush proposal also includes $30 billion (US) in defence aid to Israel over the next 10 years.

In what could be his last Israeli-Palestinian peace initiative as president, much remains before Bush can announce a place and time for the fall conference.

Tony Blair, the new envoy for the Quartet of major mediators - the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia – in September will put together an assessment on the state of the peace process and recommendations for taking it forward. The assessment will be debated by the Quartet heads later that month.

What happens next could also be coloured by Israeli domestic politics. A commission of inquiry into the Lebanon war is expected to issue a final report by October that could call for Olmert's resignation, though he has vowed to stay on.

Israelis debate over textbook

By MATTHEW WAGNER
JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Education Ministry's decision last week to approve a textbook for state-run Arab schools that uses the Arabic word for "catastrophe" to describe Israel's victory in its 1948 War of Independence has sparked intense debate.

The Arabic version of Living Together in Israel: Textbook for Homeland, Society and Citizenship will be used this school year by about 20,000 Arab Israeli third-graders.

The book attempts to weave together Jewish and Arab perspectives on the Zionist enterprise. Two pages of text devoted to the War of Independence briefly explain why the Jews came to Israel, why they wanted a state, how the Arabs reacted and how the war started with the refusal of the Arab side to accept the UN partition plan and the invasion of five Arab armies.

The controversial line reads: "The Arabs call the war 'nakba,' a war of disaster and loss, while the Jews call it 'The War of Independence.'" It is the only mention of the word "nakba," meaning "catastrophe," in any Israeli Arab primary-school textbook, experts say.

The book also states, "Some of the Arab residents were forced to leave their homes and some were expelled, and they became refugees in the neighbouring Arab countries." It continues: "Some of them became refugees and were forced to move to other Arab communities in the State of Israel, because their villages were destroyed during and after the war."

The intense debate in Israel sparked by the decision to adopt the controversial textbook underscores the ideological divide in a nation still struggling with the tension between being a Jewish state and the state of all its seven million citizens, including more than 1.3 million Arabs.

After last week's decision, politicians lined up along predictable left-right ideological lines to sound off on what many consider to be one of the most important challenges facing Israel: how to maintain national cohesion between a Jewish majority that generally identifies with the Zionist enterprise and an Arab minority that generally does not.

As the divisions between Israel's Arabs and Jews appear to deepen, the question is: does the teaching of two separate historical narratives – one for Jews and one for Arabs – foster national unity or undermine it?

Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu said the language dilutes Zionist values.

"I can't remember a greater absurdity than this in a decision made by an education minister in the State of Israel," Netanyahu told reporters.

Education Minister Yuli Tamir, who approved the textbook for the Arab school curriculum, defended her decision in an interview with Israel Radio.

"There are two populations in Israel, Jewish and Arab, and the Arab public deserves to be allowed to express its feelings," said Tamir, a member of the Labor party and one of the founders of Peace Now, an organization that advocates the dismantling of Israeli settlements and an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank.

"The book offers the Arab pupils a balanced picture, so that they may put into proper context what they are exposed to in their home environment," Tamir said.

National Religious party leader Zevulun Orlev took issue with the decision.

"Tamir is giving the Arabs the legitimacy not to recognize the State of Israel as the state of the Jewish people," Orlev, a former director general of the Education Ministry, told reporters. "The day the education minister made the decision is the 'nakba' day of the Israeli education system."

Avigdor Lieberman, strategic affairs minister and leader of the Yisrael Beiteinu party, said Tamir's decision reflects the "political masochism" of the Israeli left wing.

"The political left is constantly looking for ways to justify the other side when we have nothing to apologize for," he said.

Nabeh Abu Saleh, chairman of a committee that has been lobbying the Education Ministry to include a Palestinian perspective in the Israeli Arab school curriculum, praised Tamir's decision.

"So far, only one narrative has been taught in our schools, the Israeli narrative," Abu Saleh told JTA. "The Palestinian narrative has been totally ignored, as if there was no nakba."

Abu Saleh said that while teachers in Arab schools try to remain loyal to the official state school curriculum, sometimes in a classroom setting it is difficult to ignore students' feeling of alienation from the Zionist state.

Israel ups survivor grants

Israel will increase its payments to Holocaust survivors. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced last week that survivors over 70 will get a special supplement to their pensions and welfare allowances totaling some $28 million (US) in 2008. The sum will rise to $56 million in 2009 and about $70 million by 2011. That will translate into an additional $20 per month per survivor in 2008 for some 120,000 Holocaust survivors older than 70 living in Israel. In addition to the monthly grant, paid through the National Insurance Institute, millions of shekels will be allocated to agencies such as the Holocaust Survivors' Welfare Fund, which pays for the medical treatment of survivors. "We are correcting a 60-year-old blight," Olmert said. "The neglect of successive governments will not continue. It is important to see to it that Holocaust survivors receive these supplements and are able to live honourably."

EU signs academic pact

Israel has signed an agreement with the European Union that thwarts efforts to impose a British academic boycott of Israel. The agreement will allow Israeli universities to take part in a new six-year research program called the Seventh Research Framework, or FP7. Israel is the only nation outside the European Union that will take part in the major public-private research partnership to develop green air transport, which will be funded under the FP7 program. The deal effectively thwarts efforts by Britain's University and College Union to impose an academic boycott of Israel in Britain, having voted at its recent annual congress to campaign for "a moratorium on research and cultural collaborations with Israel via EU and European Science Foundation" as part of its Israeli boycott policy.

250-year-old Torah arrives

A 250-year-old Torah scroll from Krakow was brought to Israel by a new immigrant from New York. Kevin Schreiber, one of the 200 immigrants on an aliyah flight organized by Nefesh B'Nefesh, brought the Torah with him last week. Schreiber said the scroll was hidden during World War II in an old synagogue. The scroll was found in the synagogue's library by a relative of Schreiber who visited Krakow in 1998 and brought it to the United States. Nefesh B'nefesh estimates that more than 3,200 olim from North America will arrive in Israel this year.

Peres raps Ahmadinejad

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's denials of the Holocaust and calls for elimination of the Jewish state underscore the threat posed by Iran's nuclear program, the Israeli president said in an interview broadcast last week on National Public Radio in the United States. "Ahmadinejad is an unbelievable joke," Shimon Peres told NPR. "He claims he's religious. My impression is that, in his eyes, the nuclear bomb is higher than Allah. He's worshiping the bomb more than he's worshiping the God in heaven."

Golan ours forever: Bibi

Israel will keep the Golan Heights forever, Benjamin Netanyahu said. The Israeli opposition leader made his prediction during a prerecorded address broadcast at 30th anniversary celebrations for Katzrin, a major Golan town. "I remember the Golan Heights without Katzrin, and suddenly we see a thriving city in the land of Israel, which having been a gem of the Second Temple era has been revived anew," said Netanyahu, who opinion polls predict could win the next general elections. "This place will remain part of the State of Israel forever, but it will be much bigger and will continue to be beautiful." The Likud Party leader's comment appeared to be directed, at least in part, at Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, given widespread speculation he could enter peace talks with Syria in which Damascus would demand a return of the Golan. – JTA

'Technology is capable of neutralizing viruses very fast'

embryos against the Newcastle disease virus, which costs the poultry industry in the United States millions of dollars a year.

Further studies on avian flu H9, Sendai virus, the HIV virus and herpes simplex 1 also produced positive results. Not only was the extract able to neutralize the viruses, it also showed it has the potential to immunize against selected other viruses as well.

Now, before people start putting cinnamon sticks in their hot chocolate and sprinkling it all over their lattes, they should note that the cinnamon extract developed by Ovadia has special properties that won't be found at coffee shops or in the kitchen cupboard. First of all, it comes from a special variety of cinnamon – coumarin and cinnamon aldehyde, which are by-products of cinnamon "juice." These are actually damaging to the liver in high quantities.

"You cannot take high doses from the natural form of cinnamon," Ovadia told ISRAEL21c. "If you used it several times a day to protect you from the flu, it would be toxic."

During seasonal epidemics, about 10 to 20 per cent of the world is infected with the influenza virus, with the elderly and the young particularly at risk. In America alone, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates that 35 million to 50 million Americans are infected with the flu every season. Despite the use of vaccines, the influenza virus is still associated with significant mortality worldwide, especially now that people travel regularly and work together in offices and closed spaces.

Moreover, the global circulation of the deadly bird flu H5 (with a more than 50 per cent mortality rate in infected humans) may cause a sudden worldwide pandemic within two to three months. Until a vaccine is invented, antivirals will be the only medical intervention for use in such a pandemic, Ovadia says.

"What we know is that this technology is capable of neutralizing viruses very fast, and that it is applicable to various applications," says Dr. Nissim Chen, the business development manager of Ramot, who managed the commercialization process that ended with the licensing to Frutarom. "For example, it can be used in air conditioning systems in hospitals, and prevent infections spreading from one person to the other in closed spaces."

There is a growing tendency for researchers and clinicians to explore natural compounds against disease, Chen says, adding that Ovadia is well-known for his work on natural inhibitors of snake venom.

"This work with cinnamon is really an extension of his research. And at Tel Aviv University in general, there are several groups working on biological and chemicals structure of natural inhibitors," Chen says.

Besides the human application, Ovadia says that cinnamon fills an important niche in the agriculture industry, where chicks need to be immunized by hand against the deadly Newcastle disease virus.

"If someone needs to immunize 1,000 chicks through drops in the chicks' eyes, then we know they are not doing this accurately. It is also an issue of animal welfare," Ovadia says.

Instead, he believes that "we will be able to administer this cinnamon extract through a tiny pinprick in the shell before the chick hatches." This kind of immunization gives the chickens protection against the Newcastle virus, Ovadia says.

Applying this research to the global scale could be done only with the help of a large company – which is where Frutarom comes in. In the last 10 to 15 years, the Israeli-based flavour and food additive company's revenues have grown from $10 million a year to a projected $350 million by the end of 2007.

"We're going to take this knowhow from a food supplement to protect people from illness… It can also be used in agriculture against bird flu. Certainly, it represents a very diversified product line," says Frutarom's CEO, Ori Yehudai.

According to the company, Ovadia will continue to lead research into the development of the extract, and Frutarom estimates that the new cinnamon product will be launched in about a year – hopefully just before flu season.

MKs oppose deporting Darfur refugees

By MIJAL GRINBERG

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Dozens of Israeli legislators from across the political spectrum have urged the government to refrain from deporting to Egypt Sudanese refugees who enter Israel through the Sinai Peninsula.

Channel 10 TV news reported last week that Israeli soldiers said they had witnessed Egyptian security officers executing several refugees.

"The refugees need protection and sanctuary, and the Jewish people's history, as well as the values of democracy and humanity, pose a moral imperative for us to give them that shelter," the MKs said in a petition.

The document has been signed by 63 MKs, including Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Labor's Amir Peretz, Hadash's Dov Khenin and the National Religious Party's Effi Eitam. The legislators propose to keep the refugees in Israel until they are transferred to a safe haven abroad. MKs who signed the petition added suggestions such as building a high fence along the Egyptian border and stipulating quotas for the absorption of refugees.

The petition was further validated last week when Channel 10 produced testimonies from Israeli soldiers serving near the Egyptian border who said they had recently witnessed three refugees being killed as they tried to cross the border into Israel.

As documented by IDF security cameras, Egyptian soldiers rushed to the scene and shot several asylum-seekers dead. One of them jumped on the wire fence in an attempt to make it over to the Israeli side, but was reportedly dragged back and bludgeoned to death by the Egyptians.

The petition against deporting Sudanese asylum-seekers back to Egypt is the initiative of a group of students from Jerusalem and Ben Gurion University in Be'er Sheva. Many of the students first encountered the refugees up close in the capital. The Sudanese refugees were housed there in tents after they had entered Israel through Egypt, after escaping the genocide in the Western Sudan region of Darfur.

In conversations with refugees, the students became convinced that deportation to Egypt was tantamount to a death sentence.

"Our student group was concerned with raising the public's awareness to the refugees' plight," activist Na'ama Katz said. "When they arrived in Wohl Rose Park in Jerusalem, we got a chance to actually see what shape they were in. We began gathering testimonies and interviewing them. They told us they had been persecuted in Egypt, and we understood what going back there meant for them."

Many of the refugees told the students that they had suffered persecution and physical abuse in Egypt, Katz said.

One of them, who wished to remain anonymous, told Ha'aretz that at some point during his stay in Egypt, he and his family were afraid to leave home for fear of being beaten.

"After Sudanese refugees took to demonstrating in Egypt in 2005, it was no longer safe for us to go out on the street. We couldn't go to the police because they were part of it. The Egyptian police joined in on harassing us refugees," he said.

According to an inter-ministerial committee on refugees crossing into Israel from Sinai, about 1,400 such illegal immigrants are currently in Israel. The committee was headed by Interior Minister Roni Bar-On.

In talks last month on the African refugees, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said that any refugee caught crossing into Israel from Egypt would be returned to that country through an official crossing. Olmert said the matter had been finalized in discussions with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Upper Galilee college makes a comeback

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It's been one year since the Lebanon War and Sagi Melamed, vice-president of development for Tel Hai Academic College in Israel's Upper Galilee, insists it will take more than bombs and war to shut his institution down.

On a summer tour of North America, Melamed recently stopped in Toronto to drum up financial support for the 10-year-old northern college and talk about how it continues to survive and thrive in one of Israel's more hostile environments.

Sagi Melamed

The college, which receives funding from the Israeli government, private philanthropists and Jewish organizations worldwide, including UIA Federations Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was shelled during the war and its campus was evacuated and forced to close for the duration of the attacks.

Despite this, Melamed said, the school's administration managed to carry on, securing facilities at the University of Tel Aviv in order for students to finish their final exams.

Similarly, many Tel Hai students stayed in the Galilee to help out in bomb shelters and with refugees.

Not surprisingly, according to Melamed, as one of Tel Hai's main tenets is to foster a spirit of community service among its staff and students.

Aside from providing high-level studies to its 3,500-member student body, the college is also a mission unto itself, Melamed said.

"If we were in Tel Aviv, it would just be another great academic institution," Melamed told The CJN. "But a mile away from Lebanon, we feel our mission and duty to strengthen the community in the Galil."

Along those lines, the college, located just north of Kiryat Shmonah is building new infrastructure to house its ever-increasing student body and is on a campaign to raise $80 million over the next decade to continue cementing itself as both a cultural and economic buttress against negative migration trends.

Attracting students to Tel Hai is easy, but convincing them to put down roots in the region is a challenge, Melamed admitted.

"I have four children and live in the Galil. I put them in bomb shelters and it was a traumatic experience for me," he said. "My wife made aliyah from the [United States] and it was the first war she had to go through."

Melamed, who has lived in the area for more than eight years and also owns and runs a karate school in the area, believes in sticking it out.

"What keeps me going is the belief that this attack on us only makes our mission more important," he said. "Despite and because of these attacks, we will continue what we would be doing, but better and stronger."

In a renewed bid to maintain the growth of the college, Tel Hai has secured scholarships for students who suffered during the war and to encourage new students to enrol.

"We awarded every new student between half and full tuition to come [to Tel Hai]," Melamed said. "Every first-year student this year received either half or full tuition to come to the Galil."

The college has also formed partnerships with two major businesses in the area, the Migal Galilee Technology Centre and the Meytav Technological Incubator, all of which share personnel and resources.

"Their researchers are our professors," Melamed said. "We want to make the Galil stronger… and create the conditions for people to come and stay there."

So far, Tel Hai seems to be succeeding.

Despite its "dangerous" location near the Lebanon border, the college's enrolment has increased an average of 13 per cent each year for the last 10 years and has managed to increase 10 per cent in the year since the Lebanon War, Melamed said.

Tel Hai's academic reputation in Israel has grown in leaps and bounds since its founding.

Specializing in the fields of social work, biotechnology and nutrition, the college has also added courses in winemaking and olive-oil making.

According to Melamed, Tel Hai is also a leader in fostering Arab-Israeli dialogue through its Centre for Peace and Democracy, which offers courses designed to break cultural stereotypes.

The college is also the region's leading economic force, employing close to 700 people to serve its student body.

"Every student brings about $7,000 of economic activity. If you multiply that by thousands of students… you see how important that is," he said.

But everywhere he goes, Melamed always gets asked the same question: how can you encourage people to come study in such a high-risk territory?

"I say to them, you know, if 60 years ago Ben-Gurion, before he declared the State of Israel, said 'Oh, you know, maybe we don't have the army ready. Maybe we should wait another few years until we're in better shape'… we would never have the State of Israel," Melamed argued.

"This has been the case ever since. There are always conditions, we're always under attack, whether it's the Galil or in Sderot… tomorrow it could be Tel Aviv."

Next year, Tel Hai will offer its first master's degrees and begin an exchange program with Jewish students from Toronto.

Cotler advocates for Jews from Arab lands

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler sent written testimony to a special bipartisan U.S. congressional briefing committee on July 20, detailing his determination to see justice done for Jews expelled from Arab lands after the formation of Israel.

Cotler was originally scheduled to testify in person before a human rights caucus in Washington last month, but instead submitted written comments in order to impress upon the committee – co-chaired by congressmen Tom Lantos, a California Democrat, and Frank Wolf, a Republican from Virginia – the importance of linking any claims by Palestinian refugees to those of Jewish refugees who were expelled from their lands after the birth of the Jewish state.

Both the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives have resolutions before them on this issue. They were introduced in February and ask President George W. Bush to instruct his representative to the United Nations and all other U.S. representatives in "bilateral and multilateral fora to… use the voice of the United States to ensure that any resolution relating to… Middle East refugees… must also include a similarly explicit reference to the resolution of Jewish, Christian and other refugees from Arab countries."

The resolutions also instruct that any future Arab-Israeli peace plan also address the issue of Jewish refugees.

Writing as honorary chair of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), a New York-based coalition of Jewish groups operating under the auspices of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the American Sephardi Federation, Cotler implored the panel to acknowledge the "truth and duty of remembrance" for those disenfranchised Jews.

Cotler, a noted human rights advocate and McGill University law professor, has been advocating on this issue for more than 40 years.

"In 1967, UN resolution 242 had as one of its basic components, a 'just resolution' to the refugee question," he told The CJN last week. "I took the interpretation then… that refugees must include both Jewish and Palestinian refugees. Otherwise, we will have a distorted narrative with respect to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Reading Cotler's statement aloud, Stanley Urman, executive director of JJAC, hammered home JJAC's conviction that "Palestinians are not the Middle East's only refugees."

Using Cotler's words, Urman talked about the "forgotten exodus" of Jews from Arab lands.

"We're talking about the forced expulsion of these Jews," Urman read. "More importantly… the enactment in the Arab countries of Nuremberg type laws which decreed, for example, that Jews were the enemies of the state in which they lived… were to be denied or forfeit their citizenship… their property was to be sequestered… destroying their livelihood [and] the lives of complete communities."

According to JJAC statistics, in 1948, the total Jewish population in Arab countries such as Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, Yemen, Syria and Egypt, among others, totalled around 856,000. By 1976, that number had dwindled to approximately 32,000, and by 2005, there were less than 5,200 Jews left in Arab lands.

"Our objective is very simple: to ensure that in every context, if there's ever an explicit reference to Palestinian refugees, we believe there should be an explicit reference to Jewish refugees," Urman told The CJN. "When the world talks about refugees in the context of the Middle East, everybody speaks about Palestinians – for good reason, their plight is compelling. But their continuing suffering doesn't negate the fact that up to one million Jews in Arab countries… have [also] been displaced, and were victims of the struggle between the Arab world and the state of Israel."

Urman added that his organization, founded in 2002, worked closely with various U.S. senators and congressmen on the resolutions as part of JJAC's continuing mission to secure international rights and redress for Jewish refugees.

"Our objective is to get these resolutions passed by the end of the year," he said.

Transition Squad helping to move aging parents

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When an aging parent dies or moves to a retirement or nursing home, the adult children may not have the time or be emotionally ready to deal with their parent's home and property. During this time of transition, the family can turn to the Transition Squad. (www.transitionsquad.com or 416-249-4049 #303).

The company lifts the burden of looking after the property from the seniors and / or their children during these times of change and maximizes the equity of the property, says Viraf Baliwalla, president of Transition Squad. "We'll take things that have value to auction or we'll hold an estate or contents sale.

"The intention is to bring maximum value to the family by helping to dispose of the aging parents' property and maximizing the financial return of the sale of the property.

"Typically the children have to decide on what to do with the home and its contents. We manage that process for them."

Baliwalla says sometimes the adult children can't contend with property matters because don't have enough time, they're emotionally drained or they live out of town.

"We're working with someone who lives in Spain, an only child whose mother just went into a nursing home. He had to come back to Toronto to start putting her affairs in order, but managing her affairs is a nightmare and he had to go back to Spain."

He contacted Transition Squad to oversee the clean-up and sale of his mother's house, says Baliwalla. "First and foremost, the task is cleaning up the entire property. It's been years since anything has been done.

"We're managing every thing from the clean up and disposal of unneeded belongings to getting the house ready for sale and then managing the actual sale of the property. We work with real estate agents."

The clients pays Transition Squad a flat fee for these services, he explains. "We act as project managers. We coordinate and manage the whole process and contract out with professionals."

In the case of the man from Spain, the company has updated the electrical. wiring, and plumbing, replaced the kitchen counter, removed old wallpaper and applied a fresh coat of paint, says Baliwalla. "The goal is not to do a major renovation, but to spruce the place up to maximize the sale price."

He says one house the company fixed up was originally appraised at $425, 000 and after the work of Transition Squad it received four offers in the $470,000 range.

"A couple of thousand dollars in quick and easy upgrades brought in an-additional $50,000."

He says sometimes his company partially finances some of the work and collects the balance from the proceeds of the sale of the house. "This relieves the burden to the family of paying the renovation costs up front."

Sometimes the company works directly with seniors to help them down-size, he says

"We charge a flat fee for project management and contract with various professionals to get the work done. The cost gets passed on to the clients. We make sure that all the workers are insured, reliable and reputable."

When Transition Squad meets with a client, they give them a "Transition Action Plan," which shows the cost of doing the renovation, says Baliwalla. "We say, 'Here are the things we're going to do – renovations, home staging and we itemize and assign the cost for things like painting, landscaping, plumbing and electrical work."

The company charges a fee of $200 to $300 for a home-staging report, he explains. "It's a small investment for a big return. We can raise the selling price from the initial appraisal.

"We have a pretty good idea of the amount of our time needed to oversee the project to make sure it's done right. We typically charge $75 an hour. We give a discount for seniors. They pay $10 less or about 15 percent less [per hour]."

"Part of our agreement with real estate agents is to sell the house on the MLS and we will market the house on outside channels. If we find the buyer the client does not need to pay the real estate fees.

We charge a flat fee of $2500. If the agent finds the buyer, the agent will refund the client our marketing and reselling fee."

We Must Be Doing Something Right

(A Recent Interview With Bernie Rabinovitch; Adath Israel's Executive Director)

Reporter: Can you please give our readers a little background about the history of the Adath Israel Congregation.

Rabinovitch: The Adath Israel Congregation is over 100 years old and is the only local synagogue that made the transition from downtown to midtown without having to merge with another congregation. What started as a downtown shul catering to the Roumanishe Jewish community is now a very cosmopolitan midtown traditional conservative congregation with a diverse demographic, geographic, ethnic and social membership. This is a tribute to the vision and hard work of Adath Israel's clergy and lay leadership over the generations.

Reporter: Why do you think that having a diverse membership is important?

Rabinovitch: Our broad based appeal is a strength that we need to cherish and continue to develop. We are a member of the United Synagogues of Conservative Judaism and we pride ourselves on being the voice of the mainstream Jewish community. In today's world of endless choices, particularly with the number of synagogue options available in the Greater Toronto Area, it is comforting for the mainstream Jewish person to know that we can help them fulfill their innate need to belong and to identify with a "haimish" community of people who share basic Jewish values and to a community of people they can count on and feel deeply connected to.

Reporter: How can a congregation of 1,800 families adequately serve its membership?

Rabinovitch: As Adath Israel is the 2nd largest conservative congregation in the country and in the top 10 in North America, its members are properly served with highly regarded clergy, extensive programs, a congregational school, a truly magnificent sanctuary and beautiful social halls. Basically, we have the resources in place to serve our members' needs for spiritual, educational and social growth. Also, included in Adath Israel's wonderful membership are numerous leaders in the world of community service, education, medicine, law, accounting, business, property development as well as many people who are well versed in our traditions and can lead our services. These are the people who volunteer their time that truly makes Adath Israel the warm, inviting and exciting congregation that it is.

Reporter: Why should an unaffiliated member of the Jewish community join a synagogue when they have some many other options in the GTA to display their Jewishness?

Rabinovitch: People can do without virtually anything except for other people. What better way to invest in your Jewish identity than to join a group of mainstream fellow Jewish people and clergy who:

- Support each other in a quest to uphold our Jewish family values
- Understand the issues our families face everyday in our open and secular society
- Are striving to enhance our own Judaism and preserve our wonderful traditions for future generations

Reporter (laughing): Where can I sign up?

Rabinovitch: Your question is very timely as we are offering a 50% reduction of our annual contribution for new members for the first year. All you have to do is contact the synagogue office and we will be delighted to welcome you into our Adath Israel family and help you establish new friendships that hopefully will last from generation to generation.

Comic first novel published after 35 years

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

English teacher Sam Schichter worked on his first novel, …and then along came Rudy!, for 35 years; this year he finally celebrated its publication.

The book tells the tale of 21-year-old wannabe novelist Rudy Petinsky living in Brooklyn.

The story tracks the comic misfortunes he endures on his quest to become the next great American author, including a "making it" attempt in Hollywood, relationship rollercoasters and run-ins with dysfunctional family members.

Though many parallels can be drawn between Rudy's story and Schichter's life, the Waterloo, Ont.-based author said the book is not autobiographical.

"This is really not me. I've used highlights from my life while writing my book," he said.

These highlights include a year-long backpacking and writing sojourn in Europe, an ill-fated tinsel-town adventure and growing up with Holocaust-survivor parents.

The book drives home the message of never letting go of a dream. This is a motto Schichter is well acquainted with, since Rudy originated 35 years ago as an assignment for a creative writing class.

Schichter was told to open a grocery story rather than be an author when his application for a graduate program in creative writing at Concordia University was rejected. He later reapplied, and an earlier form of the book was the thesis for his master's degree, which he received in 1986. But Schichter faced rejection after rejection from publishers, until the book was finally accepted by the Waterloo-based Loon in Balloon.

Sam Schichter is the author of …and then along came Rudy!

The novel is "about believing in yourself and never giving up," Schichter said.

"Everyone likes to laugh," he said. "I've been told that people laugh out loud while reading the book, and that's rare."

Rudy's misadventures are humorous, and the first-person narrative and snappy banter allows the reader to easily slip into his world and, by the end of the story, root for his success.

Invariably, however, these "successes" turn out to be failures, and the book moves slowly as the protagonist hits one roadblock after another. Each turn is unpredictable as Rudy becomes involved in one odd mishap after another, from moving into a Hollywood seniors apartment building to punching out his brother-in-law.

A frustrating aspect of the novel is Schichter's use of cookie-cutter stereotypes in portraying Rudy's parents, Esther and Morris. Esther is an overbearing Jewish mother, and Morris is a passive but well-meaning and wise father.

Esther's stereotypical Jewish mother qualities are stretched too far for her to be taken seriously as a character. ("Today you overslept, yesterday you watched TV. What's on the menu for tomorrow?" she nags at her son.) She becomes annoying and predictable, and Morris does not add to the tale's development.

By the end of the book, the reader is left satisfied that Rudy has gained some wisdom in the lengthy process of growing up.

Schichter is currently working on a second novel and has just finished writing the screenplay for …and then along came Rudy!

"I've always wanted to write and direct," Schichter said. "Visually, it would be very appealing onscreen – it's one scene after another with all his misadventures."

The book is available online through www.chapter.indigo.ca or from Loon in Balloon at www.looninballon.com

RBC Seniors' Jubilee showcases a variety of artists

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Ask Gloria Valentine how old she is, and with a charming chuckle, she quips, "sextysomething."

The entertainer's humorous response is likely the prevailing view of the more than 1,300 performers who will be on stage with her at the 19th annual RBC Seniors' Jubilee.

Showcasing their singing, dancing and comedic savvy are performers in their 50s, 60s, 70s and 80s, who will put on a wide array of shows at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall Aug. 13 to 17.

"It's an amazing show," enthuses Valentine, who will sing in Yiddish and English at the Jubilee. "We may be over 50, but that doesn't mean we aren't better than ever."

Five different performances are held during the production, boasting everything from concert bands and cabaret to tango dancers and vaudeville acts.

One of the most inspiring acts is an 87-year-old tap dancer.

Gloria Valentine

"People who come to the show go away feeling that it's great to be older," Valentine says. "The audience identifies with the free spirit and the vitality of the performers."

A singer and actor, Valentine has made many appearance on film, stage and television, including in Kojak and six years at Second City.

She performs an ongoing cabaret show at the Free Times Café in Toronto, and her latest role as a witch at the 2007 Fringe Festival earned wide acclaim.

She learned to speak Yiddish as a child and is a co-founder of the Friends of Yiddish organization.

"I just love Yiddish," she says, noting she's done Yiddish concerts and comedy acts across North America and in Israel. "It comes from a place that's very deep inside me."

Launched in 1989 with 400 performers, the Jubilee has more than tripled in size over the years, attracting marquee performers and routinely filling up Roy Thompson Hall.

This year's cast features a variety of new acts, including award-winning jazz and gospel singer Billy Newton-Davis; the one man unicyclist and juggler Johnny Toronto; Australian-born singer and guitarist Peter Shaw; the swing, jazz and country quintet Moo'd Swing; and the celebrated male quartet, Claidhmor.

Also highlighted at this year's event are award ceremonies, including the Pauline McGibbon Life Achievement in the Arts Award, which will be awarded to author/singer Kelly Walker, and the Forever Young Award of Distinction, which will go to Noura, a dynamic belly dancer and instructor.

For more information about the RBC Seniors Jubilee, visit www.roythomson.com. Single tickets can be purchased by calling 416-872-4255. For group rates, phone 416-593-4822, ext. 225.

ROM sound installation features Mitch Smolkin

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Combine the vision of acoustic architect John Oswald with the zest of choral director Laurel MacDonald and mix in technical co-ordinator Phillip Strong. Then top that off with tenor Mitch Smolkin's Hebrew adaptation of a Latin hymn and, bam, you've got Qui (pronounced kwee).

Qui is a choral composition that brings together 29 singers and 29 languages. The work is part of A Time to Hear For Here, Oswald's sound installation at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) Spirit House, in the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal.

When Smolkin, 29, who is known for singing heartfelt Yiddish tunes, was approached by the ROM to contribute to Qui, it was music to his ears.

Mitch Smolkin

"I'm very interested in transformations. Since A Time to Hear for Here was connected to the new transformation at the ROM, it was an amazing opportunity," he said.

"Knowing John Oswald's track record, Qui would become a part of history, and it's an off-the-wall idea."

It's off the wall all right!

Sounds interact with ROM's architectural space, designed by Daniel Libeskind, through five tiers of speakers.

The first contributor to Qui (Latin for "who"), Smolkin sang the hymn, also called Qui, about God as a protector, in Hebrew.

"It's surprising that in synagogue, cantors or even great composers of liturgy will take a popular tune and put Adon Olam to it," he said.

"For Qui, I took the Hebrew text and made it fit what was originally written in Latin."

After recording the hymn, he was asked to say hello and goodbye in English, Hebrew, Yiddish and French, whistle and hum, and then sing a favourite tune. That is included in the recording of human voices visitors to the Spirit House may hear, depending on the day and time they are there.

The Spirit House, an irregular-shaped atrium, is an artifact-free meditative space and was designed as a secular cathedral.

While some sounds, such as the voices in Qui, are controlled by a central computer, others are random.

No two sound experiences are alike.

Smolkin's part can be heard in various forms throughout the day, including at a time when only male voices are played, but the entire Qui culminates with the 26 parts played at 5:17 p.m. every day.

Smolkin, a former artistic director for the Ashkenaz Festival, said that "Qui is always changing. It comes from many angles, which is reflective of life and who I am, like my contribution from the angle of Hebrew."

Recently at a ROM media event, he met with other Qui singers.

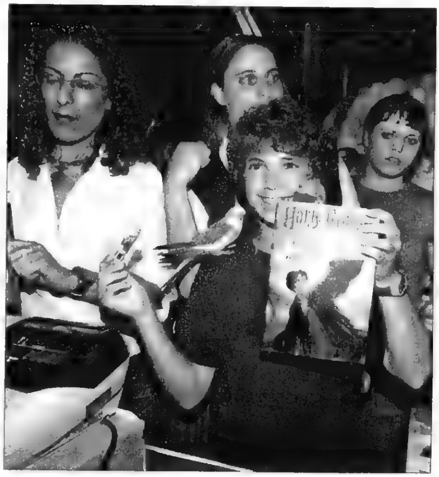
"Being there with people who take risks and stretch the envelope is a neat feeling, but it takes two to do this – it took the ROM to go out on a limb and dedicate the space to this kind of idea," he said.

For Smolkin, a key moment of the event was when Qui, a permanent ROM installation, was played and the vocalists walked around listening for their voices.

"It was a great creative force that came together," he said.

Another project of Smolkin's is the album, A Nign, which he's recording with Klezmer en Buenos Aires. The group will be performing with Smolkin at a concert to be held at the Al Green Theatre on Oct. 6. Listeners should expect the unexpected – the music includes a mix of folk, tango and jazz. The album will be released in fall 2008.

For more information about Mitch Smolkin, visit www.mitchsmolkin.com.



ACCIO BOOK SEVEN: People line up at the Old Tel Aviv Port to be the first to buy the latest Harry Potter book at 2:01 a.m. on July 21. Special booths were set up to cope with the several thousand Israelis who had ordered the book in English. The Hebrew translation will not be available until December. There was a threat by the Interior Ministry to impose fines on stores that opened on Shabbat to sell the latest book, but it seems to have fallen on deaf ears and thousands of Israelis around the country could not wait to get their hands on the final adventure of the boy wizard.

History Channel Docs: Two documentaries by Toronto television producer Alan Mendelsohn are being shown on the History Television Network this month.

A multiple Gemini Award winner, Mendelsohn wrote and directed The Road to Partition, about the fateful partitioning of the Indian subcontinent 60 years ago into mainly Hindu India and Muslim Pakistan. After two centuries of dominating India, the British were being forced out. For them, partition seemed the path of least resistance. But inadequate planning and lack of support resulted in the slaughter of one million, a carnage that has been called "one of the great tragedies of South Asia in the last century."

The Road to Partition airs Wednesday, Aug. 15, 9 p.m., on History Television's Turning Points of History series.

Part of the same series, Mendelsohn's documentary High Water Blues reveals the tragic parallels between the Mississippi flood of 1927 and hurricane Katrina, which struck Louisiana two years ago to the day. High Water Blues airs Wednesday, Aug. 29, 9 p.m.

Canadian clarinetist hailed as one of the world's greatest

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The legendary big band leader Benny Goodman's only student is a Canadian who has been hailed as one of the world's greatest living clarinettists.

Soloist and chamber musician Julian Milkis says that while he is not one to brag, his celebrity status in his native Russia is quite a contrast to his low profile in Canada.

On Aug. 13, Milkis will be appearing with his wife, pianist Nina Kogan and their son, Daniel, a violinist, at the Niagara International Chamber Music Festival in Niagara-on-the-Lake.

Daniel, 14, is a featured performer in the Showcase for Young Virtuosos to be held at noon. At 2 p.m., Milkis and Kogan will be playing Igor Stravinsky's A Soldier's Tale, a collaborative performance with musicians and actors.

Milkis and the Russian-born Kogan both come from prominent musical families. Milkis immigrated to Toronto in 1975 with his parents, pianist Marianna Milkis and violinist Yascha Milkis, formerly the associate concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and principal second violinist of the Leningrad Philharmonic.

Kogan is the daughter of the internationally acclaimed violinists Elizaveta Gilels and the late Leonid Kogan. "He was one of the legendary violinists of the 20th century," says Milkis in a recent telephone interview from his parents' Toronto home.

A proud father, he notes that Daniel is the youngest person in 30 years to be accepted as a student by the renowned teacher Maya Glezacova. "He [Glezacova] has played for [Russian President Vladmir] Putin many times."

Milkis, who grew up in St. Petersburg (then Leningrad), says that unlike Daniel he was far from being a child prodigy. At age 11, his parents switched him from piano to the clarinet because he only got a B+ on his piano exams. "That was my punishment."

However, he says he instantly took to the clarinet. "I was not a big star. I won some small local competitions."

He praises the music instruction he received at Toronto's Northview Heights Secondary School, where he was in the school band. He went on to study music in New York City, first at the Manhattan School of Music and later as a graduate student at the Juilliard School of Music. He also has an MA in English from Norwich University in Vermont.

While at Juilliard, he won a competition that landed him a debut concert at Carnegie Hall. It was the spring of 1983 and Milkis says he had just a few months to prepare for the recital. He chose the piece Contrasts, a challenging work by Hungarian composer Bela Bartok, which Goodman had originally commissioned in 1938.

Julian Milkis, centre, will be appearing in Niagara on the Lake on Aug. 13 with his wife, pianist Nina Kogan and son Daniel.

Milkis says he decided to ask the great clarinettist to help him with the piece and he agreed. "He had a very unique sound."

The two remained close, he says, until Goodman's death in 1986.

A film about Goodman's 1962 tour of Russia will feature Milkis playing with the six surviving members of Goodman's big band in a restaging of the tour.

He says he hopes the film, by Toronto producer Felix Golubev, a childhood friend from Russia, will give him more prominence in Canada, a country for which he feels a great affinity.

He says despite growing up in Russia, he always felt a strong bond with Canada because his grandmother's family settled here in the 1920s. "My great-grandparents are buried here."

He adds that during the first Canada/ Russia hockey series in 1972, he even rooted for Canada, which, in retrospect, he muses, was a risky stance to take in Russia.

So was standing up for being Jewish, he recalls. "I was in fights a lot because of anti-Semitism. I had my nose broken twice because I'm hotblooded.

"I couldn't stand the name-calling. I couldn't stand to hear them say 'dirty Jew.'"

Crypto-Jews inspire book about Conversos

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While attending a Friday night Shabbat service in San Antonio, Tx., several years ago, Vera Propp met some congregants with a rather intriguing history.

Though brought up as Catholics, the couple she met practised Jewish rituals, the reasons for which were unknown to them.

Eventually, they would come to discover they were descendants of Conversos – Jews who converted to Catholicism, most likely under duress, during the period of the Spanish Inquisition in the late 1400s, but secretly kept the faith, to some degree.

"I was in the middle of writing my first book at the time," recalls Propp.

"But when I met this couple, I thought in the back of my mind that I'd like to write about the topic."

Thus, this story about Crypto-Jews would provide the inspiration for Propp's recently published novel, Candles in the Closet.

The book, written in simple prose and geared to female readers of 12 or 13 years, is a fictional historical odyssey that touches on important social themes, such as religious intolerance, gender roles and ultimately, religious freedom.

It begins with 12-year-old Bonnie Lopez, who is curious to discover the roots of a secret family custom she witnesses her grandmother engage in – lighting candles on Friday night and reciting a prayer in a mysterious language.

Bonnie embarks on a mission to understand what these seemingly foreign customs are all about, eventually realizing they are not foreign at all but in fact part of who she is.

"I am happy to not have to worry about keeping things secret anymore," says Bonnie's relative, Margarita.

"I'm looking forward to learning about the Jewish religion, especially if it meant so much to our ancestors that they held on to its beliefs when they could have all been killed because of it."

The book doesn't shy away from the stark reality Jews of the Inquisition faced and keenly illustrates the need for secrecy in order to preserve Jewish practices and beliefs.

For instance, at one point in the novel, a Madonna statue shatters into pieces and littered among the broken shards is a silver box that contains Jewish scriptures hidden inside.

"This box contains a parchment scroll with the Shema prayer written on it in Hebrew letters… We touch it whenever we pass it, even when it is hidden in a Madonna's foot."

Other facets of the time period, such as women marrying at extremely young ages, the jailing of Jews and the adventures to the New World, are all written about in a believable style and tone.

Propp referred to scholarly research on Conversos to inform her narrative.

Though their precise numbers are not known, there continue to be descendants of Conversos in North America and elsewhere who were brought up as Catholics but practise a number of Jewish rituals.

The author of the children's Holocaust-era book When the Soldiers Were Gone, Propp formerly spent 25 years working as reading teacher in Albany, N.Y.

Getting her latest novel published has been quite a challenge for her. Propp, the grandmother of two, suffers from multiple sclerosis and is also a survivor of a debilitating stroke.

Through sheer will, determination and support, she was able to weave together a compelling narrative.

"With both books, I believe I had a really good idea that I was motivated by," she says.

"I think it's helpful to work with a writing group where you get to read each other's work. You also have to really care about what you're writing about and take it page by page."

Al Qaeda has adapted and changed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The transnational terrorist organization Al Qaeda has cut a swath of death and destruction across the United States, Europe, Asia and Africa in an attempt to destabilize the West, topple moderate Arab governments and harm Israel.

In the face of these periodic attacks, Western armies and intelligence agencies have marshalled immense resources to eradicate it, but Al Qaeda and its far-flung affiliates have, nevertheless, grown bolder and stronger.

Since Al Qaeda will doubtless haunt us for many more years to come, there is a need for a deeper understanding of its philosophy and methods.

Few analysts better understand it than Abdel Bari Atwan, editor-in-chief of the London-based Arabic newspaper al-Quds al-Arabi. A close observer of this violent Islamic fundamentalist group, he spent several days with its founding father, Osama bin Laden, in 1996 in the remote, craggy mountains of Afghanistan. Since then, Atwan's publication has been the vehicle of choice for the release of Al Qaeda's electronic communiques.

Now, in The Secret History of Al Qaeda (University of California Press), he takes a closer look at it and its leading figure. Describing his arduous trip to bin Laden's lair in Tora Bora as "the strangest assignment I have ever undertaken in a career spanning more than 30 years," Atwan likens it to a journey into the unknown.

He met bin Laden in a cave high in a snow-clad mountain range. Several years ago, U.S. forces attacked this area in a bid to capture the arch-terrorist.

When Atwan was introduced to bin Laden, he sat cross-legged on a carpet, a Kalashnikov assault rifle in his lap. He was polite, soft-spoken, smiling and gentle, his guards deferential and hanging on his every word. He did not come across as a person who has blood on his hands.

A Saudi of Yemenite descent whose father was a multi-millionaire building contractor and whose five wives have given birth to 24 children, bin Laden has harboured an absolutely "malicious hatred" of the United States since 1990, when U.S. troops were dispatched to Saudi Arabia after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

Bin Laden regarded the U.S. presence in Saudi Arabia as nothing less than an occupation. Although the United States pulled its troops out of Saudi Arabia in 2003, bin Laden never forgave the Saudi government for having had the temerity to invite an "infidel" power to stain its holy soil.

Nor has he forgiven the United States for its support of what he deems as corrupt and oppressive Arab regimes and its unstinting backing of Israel.

Osama bin Laden

Though bin Laden is Al Qaeda's undisputed leader, his second in command, Ayman al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian medical doctor from a similarly wealthy background, is extremely influential as its main theoretician. It was he who formulated Al Qaeda's strategy of creating an Islamic state in Afghanistan to serve as a base from which Muslims could regain the caliphate and their "lost glory."

Like all extremists, al-Zawahiri has tunnel vision. Atwan quotes him as saying: "The West, led by the U.S., which is under the influence of the Jews, does not know the language of ethics, morality and legitimate rights. They only know the language of brute military force."

In fact, Al Qaeda jihadists revere violence, as Atwan conclusively demonstrates in a chapter titled "Human Bombs and the Concept of Martyrdom."

"What people in the West simply don't understand is that we love death even more than they love life," he quotes bin Laden as saying in 1996.

Suicide attacks, from the events of Sept. 11, 2001, in the United States to the Madrid train station bombing in March 2004, are Al Qaeda's stock in trade. Atwan says that while such attacks are not historically or uniquely a Muslim tactic, Muslims have had the longest and most sustained record of using them in conflicts with western powers.

Suicide bombers are chosen on the basis of their religious zeal, courage and mental stability. They must also have a clean criminal record and be at least 18 and single. The bombers do not believe that they will die, but that they will ascend to a better life in paradise, attended to by 72 nubile virgins.

Atwan rates Sept. 11 as the day Al Qaeda morphed into a global force and bin Laden became a symbol of radical Islam. Since that terrible moment, Al Qaeda has evolved into "a network of loosely affiliated franchises operating more or less independently of a leadership on the run."

Atwan points out that the vast majority of Al Qaeda's membership has been and remains Saudi. The Saudi regime encouraged about 45,000 Saudi men to join the mujahedeen to expel the Soviet army from Afghanistan. They, in turn, proved to be apt recruiters for a new generation of jihadis.

He cites a survey, taken shortly after Sept. 11, in which 95 per cent of educated Saudis, aged 21 to 41, voiced support for Al Qaeda. He also notes that bin Laden fully embraces Wahhabism, Saudi Arabia's austere brand of Islam.

In Atwan's view, the Saudi royal family has unwittingly played into Al Qaeda's hands. The kingdom's 6,000 princes and their 24,000 children and relatives enjoy ostentatious wealth, replete with palaces, private jets and ocean liners. Yet in Saudi Arabia, per capita income has fallen and poverty is endemic.

The Saudi branch of Al Qaeda has been on the offensive since May 2003, when it blew up three compounds housing foreign workers in Riyadh, killing 34 people and wounding 200.

It has since attacked oil fields, the lifeblood of the Saudi economy, government offices and the American consulate in Jeddah. King Abdullah recently vowed to crush such terrorism.

Al Qaeda has also recruited jihadis in Europe, Atwan says, citing arrests in Italy, Spain and Britain.

He agrees with the assessment that the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq has been of great benefit to Al Qaeda. Iraq has become a safe haven and a training ground for its fighters. Or as he bluntly puts it, "American foreign policy is the best recruitment officer Al Qaeda has ever had."

The Internet has also been a key element in Al Qaeda's success.

"Some commentators have gone so far as to declare that Al Qaeda is the first Web-directed guerrilla network," he writes, adding that there are now more than 4,500 overtly jihadi websites, all of which help bring together like-minded people.

Not surprisingly, thousands of Al Qaeda supporters and sympathizers are currently studying computer science as a way to support the cause. "Nowadays, jihadi groups require four essential ingredients: members, a leader, a religious guide and information technology specialists," according to Atwan.

The late leader of Al Qaeda's Iraqi branch, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was gunned down by American troops last year, was in part so effective due to his mastery of the Internet.

In concluding his useful survey, Atwan says that Al Qaeda – the first radical organization with a significant global constituency – should not be underestimated, given its ability to adapt to changing circumstances.

Al Qaeda is also exceedingly dangerous because it has the potential to mobilize thousands, perhaps millions, of the world's 1.3 billion Muslims.

$5-million AIDS lab unveiled at Montreal hospital

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A new $5-million biocontainment HIV/AIDS research laboratory was recently unveiled at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

The lab will use the latest cutting-edge equipment and top researchers in the field to cultivate and analyze the virus, develop drugs and secure new funding to keep the work going, its director said.

"The new lab is now on par with any lab in the world in growing HIV," said Mark Wainberg, director of research at the JGH.

The new facility is on the third floor of the JGH's Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research and is several times larger than the previous one there. The first AIDS lab at the hospital was launched by Wainberg in 1984, as the AIDS epidemic began to take hold. The latest one is its fourth.

"We used to be the size of one garage," Wainberg, 62, said. "Now we're the size of six."

Actually, probably more.

The new lab has 10 rooms and is physically sealed off from the rest of the hospital. It also has several fail-safe mechanisms to prevent contamination from entering or leaving. Entry doors are automatic and double-air-locked – one door doesn't open until the other closes. Anything hinting of taint goes into 130-degree Celsius autoclaves similar to the devices used to sterilize surgical instruments. All workers wear masks and gowns, and even the ventilated air is hepa-filtered several times before going back into the atmosphere.

Wainberg said the level of safety is, "in many ways, overkill," since the AIDS virus has never been known to be transmitted through the air. "But the government said these are the rules, and they are very stringent."

It was noted that the lab is only one of two in Quebec authorized to genotype – that is, examine the genetic sequencing of – the virus, and one of only a few in Canada rated as a Level 3 facility in terms of its stringent Health Canada safety standards. This allows the lab, as of July 3, to store and reproduce the virus on site and in quantity, and to test tissue samples.

Wainberg, who is an internationally reputed AIDS researcher, said while the old facility still adhered to Canadian safety guidelines, it was "outmoded" and perhaps a year away from breaching standards.

"It was the small details," he said. "Not enough room in an old lab, not big enough to accommodate employees or bring in new equipment."

The new facility, by comparison, will accommodate 25 employees at a time, and Wainberg said 82 people working in seven JGH hospital labs are trained to work there.

At a press conference prior to a tour of the new facility, Wainberg said one of the main research tasks in the lab will be to examine the process by which one subtype of the virus (there are 10 discovered so far) becomes drug resistant, compared to another type. More specifically, researchers will compare Subtype B, the predominant strain of HIV infecting 65,000 Canadians, with Subtype C, which is infecting 11 million in South Africa and has been seen in Quebec.

Mark Wainberg, director of research at the Jewish General Hospital, is seen in the hospital's new HIV/AIDS lab.

AIDS, he said, remains an elusive foe. Wainberg has been credited with the 1989 development of 3TC, an anti-retroviral drug, but such drugs, he pointed out, inevitably grow resistant over time because the virus mutates. That's why the search is always on for new ones, he said, even though a future vaccine is still the "holy grail."

Wainberg noted that in Quebec, half of the new AIDS cases are coming from newly infected people who don't yet know they have it, because there is a three-month lag between getting infected and showing HIV antibodies in the blood.

Even if someone is tested during this crucial three-month period, he said, nothing would show. He said part of the lab's work will be focused on seeking faster methods to see the antibodies.

Wainberg said of the $5-million cost of the new lab, which is also affiliated with the McGill AIDS Centre, $2.2 million came from the federally and provincially funded Canadian Foundation for Innovation, and another $2.8 million came from the JGH Foundation. The lab also has an annual operating budget of $1.3 million through a mixture of public and private funding.

Wainberg said he planned to send a grant application to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation by August, as well as to others such as the Clinton Foundation, to help fund continuing research.

Believing in yourself

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

There's a beautiful song from the show The Wiz, sung by the character Glenda, called Believe in Yourself. The lyrics from that song represent the most important aspect of life coaching.

Before we can have dreams and goals and wishes, we have to begin with the belief that they can be achieved. Then we simply take that belief and turn our dream into a reality. It's often as simple as that, but we tend to make it more complicated. Sometimes we feel the belief deep down inside, and it's only a matter of reminding ourselves that it's there so that we can propel ourselves forward.

Other people have to borrow the inspirational attitude of Anne Frank. Anne, in her famous diary, said that "everyone has inside of him a piece of good news." The good news is that you don't know how great you can be – how much you can love, what you can accomplish and what your potential is.

People often ask the questions, "How do I believe in myself, what will unlock the key to my true happiness?" The answer is, begin by believing in your potential and in your ability to do what it is you dream of. Then you can make a game plan and begin the hard work necessary to put your plan into action. There is no question that it takes hard work.

I know someone who worked on Bay Street as a lawyer for 20 years, with incredible discipline and drive, so that he could retire by age 50 and pursue all of the things he has always dreamed of. He is now living on a farm with an incredible vineyard and is truly living his bliss.

I know a girl who has an extraordinary singing voice and spends her time doing community theatre and school plays (even though she could really be a professional musical theatre performer) and she often gets the lead role. She is supremely talented, but she also believes in herself. Then she backs up her talent with incredible discipline and hard work, and the result is a stunning achievement every time.

We all want our children to believe in themselves and so we remind them of all of their beautiful qualities and strengths. It is so important that we do that often so belief in themselves becomes a part of them.

My column today was inspired by a friend whom I talked with recently about sending her son to camp. I said to her, "Well, at least your son is going away to camp with a close friend and he can hold on to that."

And then my friend replied, "But that's not how I want to look at it. I want him to be okay inside, on his own, and not rely on his friend, but rely on himself." Beautifully said.

I love the quote by Vincent van Gogh that says, " If you hear a voice within you say you cannot paint, then by all means paint, and that voice will be silenced."

Confidence also comes from preparation, from research, from good, honest hard work, and from believing in the cans, not the can'ts.

Thomas Edison said, "If we did all the things we are capable of doing, we would literally astound ourselves."

So take out a pen and paper and write down a list of 10 things you would love to accomplish, beginning with the most incredible and fantastic dreams, goals or wishes, and whichever one calls to you the most is the place to begin.

I would love to hear what you have to say about believing in yourself and about your greatest wish.

And remember, as the song Believe in Yourself goes, "Believe there's a reason to be. Believe you can make time stand still. And know from the moment you try. If you believe, I know you will."

Judy Siblin-Librach is an Adler-trained life coach. Her website address is www.findingyourbliss.com; her e-mail address is judyelle@ican.net.

Foundation nurtures and promotes Israeli artists

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

Actor Chaim Topol, violinist Itzhak Perlman and designer Gideon Oberson are international beacons, each of whom attract more goodwill for Israel than a hundred press conferences. But are they all that Israel has to offer the world of culture?

Far from it, according to Rachel Marani, founder and director of the Israel Cultural Excellence Foundation (IcExcellence), an organization that nurtures and promotes cultural excellence in Israel.

While serving in Washington, D.C., as Israel's cultural attaché, Marani organized 360 events in prestigious venues around the city – from classical and ethnic Israeli music concerts to Israeli film galas and writing festivals – to mark Israel's 50th anniversary.

"Many in our U.S. audiences were exposed to Israeli culture for the first time, including the critics," says Marani. "Over and again I was asked: 'Why aren't these wonderful artistes internationally known?'"

In 2001, on returning to Israel, Marani established IcExcellence to help launch Israeli artists into the global cultural arena. She organized a volunteer artistic advisory committee of 35 leading Israeli artists and pundits (among them six Israel Prize laureates) and started to raise funds from businesses, foundations and private individuals worldwide.

Two years later, IcExcellence and Rachel Marani were honoured for their promotion of constructive change in Israeli society with the 2003 Leadership Formation Award, given by the Israeli alumni associations of Harvard University and Wharton-Penn Harvard Business School.

This award and the success of the artists selected by the foundation suggest it has found the right path. But just how is excellence nurtured and promoted? By a fundamental switch in mentality, according to Marani. "Artistes mustn't sit and wait for fame to find them," she says. "They must go out and get it."

Hard work is emphasized, says Marani. "After all, we're not a 'fairy godmother' foundation. We don't give grants or money. Although great artistic talent is a prerequisite, talent in itself is not sufficient to develop a prominent local and/or international career. Our artistes also need the tools which will help them succeed in the long run, not provide momentarily relief."

To this end, IcExcellence gives its artists three things: an individual, custom-made artistic program, career-building skills and membership in a small but growing all-star community of Israelis pursuing cultural excellence.

"As an essential part of our vision, IcExcellence-chosen artists are also committed to give back to the community," says Marani. "Their volunteer programs are varied and include concerts at centres for disabled adults, helping at preschools for autistic children, inviting disadvantaged women or newcomers to performances, working with gifted children in the periphery."

All under 40, the 28 artists chosen to date by the foundation come from the fields of visual arts, jazz, classical and Israeli music, dance, theatre and cinema, product design, visual communication, fashion design and writing. They are all extraordinary artistic talents, highly motivated and determined.

Most of the foundation's artistic programs include learning from global greats and being paired with world-renowned cultural and educational institutions.

Visual artist Yehudit Sasportas became the first Israeli ever to be accepted to the program and was given a full-year residency at the prestigious Künstlerhaus Bethanien art centre in Berlin. She was chosen to represent Israel this summer at the Venice Biennale, a major contemporary art exhibition.

Pianist, conductor and composer Yaron Gottfried was sent to the exclusive MacDowell Colony art centre in New Hampshire for a month and returned with a major new work.

Graphic artist Adi Stern chose to do a post-graduate degree in typography at Britain's Reading University, where he designed a new Hebrew font – Noam.

"As an artist," says Gottfried, "IcExcellence has helped me feel that I don't have to go into battle alone. In 2004, I was given the opportunity to attend an international congress in Boston for artistic directors, where I learned about conducting and directing orchestras. I was exposed to new materials and I formed a network of connections. Since then, I have already received two invitations to conduct and perform works of mine in the U.S."

Combined with the artistic program are career studies. "These were developed by the foundation and are based on principles drawn from the business world," says Marani.

Artists are invited to participate in two annual workshops to discuss issues that are vital to their career progress. The workshops include lectures and seminars by high-level professionals on subjects such as strategic thinking, self-presentation, marketing, branding, identifying and defining goals, formulating a plan of action, ongoing evaluation and networking. In addition, professional counselling and private business coaching is available to artists who it is felt can benefit from a more personal process.

The workshops have developed into a third area in which the foundation assists artists – a supportive community of artists has been created, in which not only feelings and experiences but also talents are shared.

Fashion designer Claudette Zorea, whose first major collection was presented in 2005 and who was invited to collaborate with the influential designer Jean-Paul Gaultier, is presently designing an evening suit for conductor Yaron Gottfried.

"Three of our graphic and visual artists are designing the sleeves for the discs of the recording artists, and visual artist Gal Weinstein designed the stage for choreographer Yasmeen Goder," says Marani. "Joint projects are being born now literally every day."

Marani says it is thrilling to see the artists turn their goals and inspiring visions into realities.

Lior Elmalich, who was born and raised in the northern border city of Kiryat Shmona, was drawn to Andalusian music from an early age. Elmalich is now recognized worldwide as one of the finest modern singers of traditional Spanish and Moroccan poems and is currently working with the Hebrew University's ethnomusicology department, preserving Jewish cultural musical treasures.

Choreographer and dancer Emanuel Gat, who established his own dance troupe in 2004 – the Emanuel Gat Ensemble – quickly gained worldwide success and recognition, and has performed in Israel, the United States, Britain, France, Japan, Singapore, Korea, Greece, Germany, Serbia, Turkey and Italy. Using his international contacts, Gat is working toward his dream of building a dance centre in the Negev. This ambitious venture will provide a "laboratory" for choreographers and performance space for dance groups from Israel and abroad, and will serve as an educational and training centre.

Marani is delighted that her endeavour to reveal Israel's hidden cultural treasures has succeeded beyond expectation. "Our artistes' careers are progressing by leaps and bounds. Within the decade I believe many of them will be global figures, performing on the world's stages and in concert halls, their work displayed in its galleries and museums," she says.

"They'll make Israel a byword for cultural excellence and a source of pride not only for Israelis but for the entire world Jewish community."

For more information about IcExcellence, visit www.icexcellence.com

Rachel Marani, seated second row, second right, founded IcExcellence to help launch Israeli artists into the global cultural arena. With her are some of the foundation's artists.

Paralympian trades ice for hardcourt

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The world's top-ranking goalie in sledge hockey is about to try his lightning-fast glove and blocker hands at volleyball.

Paul Rosen, a four-time Canadian sledge hockey paralympic gold-medallist and motivational speaker, recently qualified for the national men's sitting volleyball team and will compete at the Parapanamerican Games in Brazil this summer.

It's yet another accomplishment in the 47-year-old Thornhill, Ont., resident's inspirational career.

As the name implies, sitting volleyball is played from a seated position. The rules are mostly the same as standing volleyball, except the net is lower and players' rear ends must remain in contact with the floor at all times.

Rosen likens the sport to his beloved sledge hockey, where players, seated on customized bladed sleds, must rely on arm strength and agility to get around on the ice.

In sitting volleyball, players are outfitted with special pant-shorts that allow for increased sliding along the hardwood floor.

The uniform, Rosen said, lets players "push yourself from point to point and slide about halfway across the floor," he said.

While on a speaking tour with Hockey Canada earlier this year, Rosen was approached by sitting volleyball team manager, Phil Allen, who asked him if he wanted to try training with his squad.

"I'd always been joking around about playing a summer sport – you know, throwing a javelin or something," a genial Rosen quipped to The CJN. "I'm always up to a challenge, so I said 'Sure.' I went on the floor, played with the guys and I loved it."

The next day, Rosen received an e-mail from Allen asking him to join the team for the upcoming Parapanamerican games in Rio de Janeiro from Aug. 12 to 19, where Canadian paralympians will compete against teams from the United States, Brazil, Costa Rica and Cuba.

Only the gold-medal team from the Rio Games will qualify to compete at the 2008 Beijing Summer Paralympics.

Not surprisingly, Rosen has quickly become a veteran, cheerful, stabilizing presence on his new team.

His new teammates have been equally swift to horse around with the goalie-turned-volleyballer.

"It's a tough game, and they're afraid I'll get into that goalie habit and catch the ball," Rosen said with laugh.

But if there's something he fears, Rosen hasn't stumbled upon it yet.

After breaking his right leg in 14 places while playing amateur hockey in 1975, effectively ending his "abled" sports career, Rosen endured more than two decades of painful surgeries and recovery, only to have doctors discover a massive infection in the leg in 1999, leaving him with a no-choice decision: amputate or die.

While many people would be angry at the news and the messengers, Rosen takes ultimate responsibility for his fate.

"I never [sued] the doctors, because 90 per cent of what happened to me was my stupidity, my fault. When I was told not to play anymore, I didn't listen. When I was told to have a cast on for seven months, I took it off after three," Rosen recalled. "I can look in the mirror today and know that what happened to me happened because of me and no one else. So even before I had the amputation, I knew I was going to beat it."

What he didn't know, was how a comment during a difficult rehab session by 12-year-old Shane Smith, himself a triple amputee, would inspire him to go way beyond just surviving his amputation.

Smith asked Rosen if he still had a heart and a brain. Rosen said "yes," to which Smith responded, "Then what's wrong with you?"

Eight years later, both Rosen's athletic and speaking careers are thriving. And he credits Smith for it all.

"When I had the conversation with Shane, that's when I knew I would achieve greatness," Rosen said. "I lived because I have to spread the message to people that you can achieve anything if you put your mind to it. It's taken a huge toll in my personal life, but it had to be done."

The toll is a perpetually packed schedule that keeps him away from his three children for weeks and months on end while he travels the world, competing for his country and inspiring people everywhere with his story.

It also recently cost him his 27-year marriage. Still, he soldiers on.

Rosen estimates he does approximately 125 speaking engagements a year between his roles as a Canadian Paralympic Committee ambassador and his private business.

And after Rio, he'll resume his sledge hockey schedule, which sees him travelling to Japan, Norway, Germany and the United States over the next year.

He relishes any time he gets to spend with his three kids when he's back home in Toronto.

"They're happy daddy's breaking barriers and doing some incredible things no one gave him a chance [to achieve]. But it's tough on them," Rosen said. "To the general public, I have a million things… but deep down, all I have is my kids."

Rosen plans to go into broadcasting after his hockey career ends. He said the 2010 Vancouver Paralympic Games will be his last.

When people compliment him on all he's accomplished, Rosen shrugs the praise off and recites what he's been telling people for years.

"There's nothing special about me. I'm a 47-year-old guy who decided that 'no' is not in my vocabulary, that I can do anything," he said.

When asked if he ever wishes he had his leg back, Rosen answers resolutely.

"Absolutely not. No way. Not a chance. I've learned way too much from coming as close as I did to dying, to losing my leg, losing my marriage… if I [hadn't lost the leg], I would have gone on like everybody else, taking life for granted. I have no regrets. Absolutely none."

Keep on cycling

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

It was a lovely Sunday morning in late June, and I was out for a shorter than usual cycle. I got onto the Don trail at Finch Avenue, just a few blocks from my home, with the intention of cycling down to one of the coffee shops on my North York path. There, I would have a coffee and read my book – a habit I developed years ago to combine exercise and reading enjoyment.

At the intersection of Leslie Street and Sheppard Avenue, two older women on bicycles were awaiting the light change with me.

One asked, "Is the path still closed at Queen Street?"

"Yes, it's a real shame, as getting to the Beaches or downtown is not as easy, since it now requires a lot of on-road riding, which I don't like," I answered.

They agreed, the light changed and off we went, only to meet up again just above York Mills Road. "We're going to the Tim Hortons around the corner," they told me.

"I would love to join you if I can sit with you and chat," I replied.

"Sure."

Over coffee, Doris and Anne revealed that they were both 73 years old. Although they rode bikes as kids and Anne had ridden during the war in Ireland, which she recounted in a lovely, lilting Irish accent, they took up cycling for recreation just a few years ago. They were part of a larger group of about 12 women, mostly in their age group. They often cycled together in varying sized groups.

A number of them, including Anne and Doris, took long trips to destinations as far away as Ireland, France, Vermont and, most recently, Holland, which they enthusiastically agreed was one of the best. "It was flat, beautiful and cycle-friendly."

They slept on a barge that transported their luggage – and when necessary their bikes from one part of the country to the next, a real treat which they shared with about 50 other international cycling enthusiasts of all ages, including a few older than them.

We shared stories, as I too had cycled in Holland and Vermont and have contemplated some European jaunts now that I have some more flexibility in my work schedule. We went from cycling stories to Ireland stories, which I introduced by noting that while studying medicine in Scotland, I did a month-long external medical rotation in 1963 in Northern Ireland's Londonderry.

I recounted a pre-"troubles" conversation I had had with an ophthalmologist whose outpatient clinic I was assigned to. While examining a nine-year-old boy with a squint, the ophthalmologist asked, "So what does your father do?" He determined that the boy's father was on welfare and the boy had eight siblings.

The physician looked at me, and in front of the lad, said, "Now you see the trouble with Ireland. I am paying for his father to be on the 'dole' [welfare] and have as many kids as he wants, while I work to pay their way."

What an eye-opener to the world of Irish society and politics that was. The terrible fighting is said to have officially started six years later, in 1969, when 67-year-old Francis McCloskey was killed by a Royal Ulster Constabulary officer.

Anne, Doris and I parted ways, having had an engaging, mutually warm and enlightening encounter. I will follow one of the cycle trip tips they gave me and hope to see them again on the cycle paths. Just keep cycling, even as you age. It is good for the body and the soul.

FROZEN MANGO, BLACKBERRY CASSIS & VANILLA MOSAIC

2 pints (4 cup) mango sorbet
1 pint (2 cup) vanilla ice cream
1 1/2cup fresh blackberries
1/4 cup sugar
2 tblsp black currant flavoured liqueur (or your choice of fruit flavoured liqueur)
9"x5"x3" loaf pan or 7-8-cup mold

Soften sorbet & ice cream in refrigerator, about 45 min. Purée blackberries, sugar, & liqueur until smooth; press through fine sieve set over a bowl; discard solids. Freeze 20-40 min. to thicken slightly until ice cream is ready; stir until smooth. Lightly oil loaf pan; cut parchment to fit bottom and long sides of pan, leaving at least 3" of overhang on each side. Fill pan decoratively with spoonfuls of sorbet/ice cream mixture, pressing down and filling empty spaces with blackberry purée. Smooth top, to eliminate air spaces, then fold parchment flaps over top and freeze until solid, at least 3 hrs. To unmold, run knife along short sides of pan to loosen mosaic, then open parchment and invert onto a flat serving dish, discarding parchment. Cut into 1/2 thick slices...

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Permit me to digress from my usual bits of educational advice. I would guess that the following qualifies as a peek into my own education.

I was recently crossing the Atlantic from England to the United States on board the Queen Mary 2 instead of the usual cramped seat of a plane. When we reached the shores of New York, my first glimpse of the Statue of Liberty was through the fog and rain of an early sunrise. As early as it was, dozens of my fellow passengers were on the deck for the event, and the boat played America the Beautiful. I was truly moved by the experience. It was and still is the case that millions of refugees have looked to the United States (and Canada) as a safe haven from persecution in countless other, less fortunate countries.

Whenever I hear criticism of the United States (justified or not), I think of the many millions whose lives were saved merely by being on this side of the world instead of somewhere else. I also think of their countless progeny and the many millions more who could be saved by the democracy and justice found there and not elsewhere. We need to be reminded of that from time to time.

And that arrival reminded me of two other boat incidents.

I thought back to the first visit I made to Israel in 1965, also by boat. I was awake the entire night before the landing in Haifa thinking about the great privilege I had been given as the first member of my family to travel "home."

As emotional a moment as that was, it made me think of yet another landing. And the Queen Mary 2 evoked that other event as well. My mother came to Canada in the early 1920s on a boat from Belgium. She was about 12 at the time, an orphan due to a combination of pogrom and Ukrainian famine, and alone in the world. Did she think the same lofty thoughts as she glimpsed the shores of Canada? Her crossing was not as luxurious as mine, but she might have found it princely compared to her shtetl. What if she had gone to Palestine instead of Canada?

Only the wide ocean can inspire such questions without answers.

A heterodox paradox

Guest Voice

Dismay and shock reverberate in American "modern Orthodox" Jewry because of an article, Orthodox Paradox, in the New York Times Magazine (July 22).

The author is Noah Feldman, a brilliant legalist and professor at Harvard with great academic accomplishments. Feldman is an alumnus of Maimonides School in Brookline, Mass., a modern Orthodox day school.

Feldman fell in love with another bright academic. She is not Jewish, but the marriage did not weaken his emotional ties to his roots. He attended Maimonides class reunions and submitted personal events (marriage, births of children) to the alumni newsletter.

But the newsletter ignored his submissions. A class photograph with him and his wife was "fixed" to omit them. The school obviously did not want to acknowledge his intermarriage. This exclusion caused Feldman great anguish and ultimately led to the aforementioned article.

The article traces Feldman's history at Maimonides, a school with a rigorous curriculum of traditional Jewish subjects alongside first-rate secular studies. Expressing great disillusionment, Feldman writes: "Despite my intimate understanding of the mindset that requires such careful attention to who is in and who is out, I am still somehow taken by surprise each time I am confronted with my old school's inability to treat me like any other graduate. I have tried in my own imperfect way to live up to values that the school taught me, expressing my respect and love for the wisdom of the tradition while trying to reconcile Jewish faith with scholarship and engagement in the public sphere… I have not felt myself to have rejected my upbringing, even when some others imagine me to have done so by virtue of my marriage."

The glaring inconsistency in his reasoning, claiming "intimate understanding of the mindset," yet still being "taken by surprise," is stunning. Much more serious, however, is the sequel, as he moves to a critique of traditional Judaism as a whole.

Orthodox Jews clinging to the tenets of their faith are termed "fanatics" and "cult-members." Traditional precepts – prayer-shawls, tfillin, Shabbat laws, sexual mores and the dietary laws – are ridiculed as incompatible with reason and modernity.

Had someone else written this, we could dismiss it as an ignorant rant seeking to evoke contempt for Judaism, if not anti-Semitism. Not so here. Feldman knows that he stooped to crude distortions. His onslaught against the tradition he claims to still cherish can be interpreted one way only – he wants to avenge himself against those who refuse to sanction the lifestyle he has chosen. He forgets that his school did not exclude him; he excluded himself.

A popular perception of academics is that they are open-minded and objective. The reality, unfortunately, is different. Reason is often abused to rationalize the worst forms of prejudice.

Feldman concedes that on the rational level, he understands the situation. On the emotional level, however, he casts reason aside. Looking into the deceiving mirror of self-love and self-interest he sees a victim of discrimination. Even so, one wonders why he wrote an article that sounds like the tantrums of a petulant child. No doubt he has his own red lines, which his morals and professionalism preclude his crossing. Why then the surprise that others, too, have their boundaries? His expectation that modern Orthodoxy would sacrifice "Orthodoxy" on the altar of relativist modernism is demanding spiritual suicide.

Feldman exercised his right of free choice of lifestyle, fully aware of its implications. We empathize with his pain, and sincerely hope that there will be a mutually happy ending.

How sad and disturbing, however, that he concludes his article with a rhetorical question: "Isn't everyone's life a mass of contradictions?" Yes, indeed! But an honest and reasonable person does his best to resolve these. If unable to do so, he will at least acknowledge his weakness and not try to justify and sanction it.

Teens from Kharkov, Ukraine, face off against one another during a "Fear Factor" evening program at the Jewish Agency for Israel's summer camp. [Abigail Bimman photo]

Kids build Jewish identity at Ukraine camp

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

ODESSA — Summer camp is the same worldwide: children can learn about themselves in fun and challenging ways, while making new friends and participating in various activities.

But 10,000 children and 2,000 college students who live in the former Soviet Union (FSU) are also building Jewish identity at camp.

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) has been operating summer camps in the FSU for the past 16 years. The 70 camps that JAFI runs focus not only on building identity but also on serving as a base for Jewish involvement during the rest of the year.

On a recent JAFI-led press tour in Ukraine, a small group of journalists visited two of the four summer camps there.

The first camp was in Odessa, a city of one million with a rich Jewish heritage and history. The camp is dubbed "Artist's City," and is an eight-day overnight program for children aged six to nine. Over the summer, the camp runs three sessions and serves about 300 campers.

"The camp is a very big contribution to building identity," said Natasha Voskovoinik, who has been the camp's director for three summers, "not only because we are letting these kids know that because they have Jewish roots, they are part of a global identity, but we are also building their identity for something in themselves here and now."

(Voskovoinik spoke in Russian through a translator, like most of the people interviewed for this article.)

This camp operates out of a run-down college-dorm-style building, in which campers in groups of 15, with three counsellors, share their artistic creations and experiences with other groups.

Every drab common area and the children's dorms were filled with bright, creative artwork, from sailboats with painted silk sails that represent the children's dreams to decorated Hebrew letters.

Cotler client faces execution

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

When you speak to Shoaib Choudhury on the phone, it seems almost unfathomable that this man who is laughing and sounds so relaxed and serene is facing charges that lead to his execution if he is convicted.

Shoaib Choudhury

The Bangladeshi journalist and editor of the English-language Weekly Blitz has, for nearly four years, lived almost every day under a Sword of Damocles for daring to be a pro-Israel Muslim and for crusading against the forces of radical Islam that he says are taking over his beloved country.

At writing, Choudhury was scheduled, after five postponements in less than a year, to go on trial Aug. 17 for sedition, treason and blasphemy, charges all dating back to his attempt to travel to Israel in 2003 to give a speech on interfaith dialogue.

Since then, he has been attacked, beaten, tortured and jailed, and efforts to have the charges against him dropped – including by his international counsel, MP Irwin Cotler – have failed.

Yet, speaking on Aug. 5 to The CJN during a trip to the United States – he was allowed to leave his country for the trip – Choudhury, in contrast to his upbeat manner, also came across as a man of serious and determined conviction and moral courage.

"If I am convicted or I am executed, it will not change our mission," he said. "I am sure that someone else would take over."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Travis Picks Ovadia

TORONTO — Israeli-born Toronto resident Dvira Ovadia, 26, was named design icon Debbie Travis' chief designer earlier this month in the finale of Global TV's reality show From the Ground Up. Ovadia, the only Jewish contestant on the show's second season, beat out 13 other hopefuls to become head designer of Travis' line of condos and homes. Ovadia, who has an architecture degree from the University of Toronto and a master's in interior design from New York's Pratt Institute, wrapped up shooting of the series last fall.

Deportations Sought

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has launched a court challenge seeking judicial review of Ottawa's decision not to revoke the citizenship of Wasyl Odynsky and Vladimir Katriuk, whom courts ruled were guilty of lying about their wartime pasts when entering Canada. Last May, the Tory government decided not to revoke their citizenships, despite evidence they took part in Nazi war crimes, B'nai Brith said. Its senior legal counsel, David Matas, said some cabinet ministers didn't hear all the available evidence from Jewish groups and Shoah survivors, which would have shown the elderly men should be deported.

WORLD

Banker Led Rebirth

PARIS — Baron Elie Robert de Rothschild, who rebuilt his family's wine and banking empires after the Shoah, died of a heart attack at age 90 at his Austrian hunting lodge, police in the province of Tyrol said. In June, family patriarch Baron Guy de Rothschild died in Paris. In World War II, Elie de Rothschild was captured near the Belgian border and wound up in a Nazi PoW camp. He was reunited with a brother, Alain, and although they were Jews, they were treated as captured officers and weren't executed. After the war, Rothschild led efforts to rebuild the family businesses. He held 25 per cent of the family banking empire.

Shoah Historian Dies

NEW YORK — Holocaust historian Raul Hilberg, author of the three-volume The Destruction of the European Jews, died Aug. 4 of lung cancer in Vermont, where he lived. He was 81. A Vienna native, Hilberg fled Austria with his parents in 1939 and arrived in the United States after stops in France and Cuba. Most of his family died in the war. Hilberg returned to Europe as a soldier with the U.S. Army in 1944. A year later, he discovered Hitler's private library in boxes in the former Nazi headquarters in Munich, reportedly prompting his interest in writing about Nazism. Hilberg's study of the Holocaust, published in 1961, became one of the most important works ever written on the Shoah.

Reform Publishes Sex-Change Brachot

NEW YORK — In a ground-breaking move to recognize the experiences of transgender Jews, the Reform movement published prayers for sanctifying sex changes.

The Union for Reform Judaism last week released the second edition of Kulanu, its 500-page resource manual for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender inclusion.

The guide includes two blessings authored by Rabbi Elliot Kukla, formerly of Toronto's Danforth Jewish Circle, who was known as Eliza when ordained in 2006 by Reform's New York seminary. Rabbi Kukla originally wrote them for a friend who wanted to mark each time he received testosterone therapy. But the rabbi believes they're appropriate for many points in the sex-change process, including "moments of medical transitions."

Large parts of the U.S. Jewish community accept gays and lesbians serving as rabbis and cantors, and many back rabbinic officiation at same-sex commitment ceremonies. But the Reform movement, the largest U.S. Jewish stream, had never gone as far as endorsing sex-change blessings.

The first Hebrew blessing praises God as "the Transforming One to those who transform/transition/cross over." A second blessing, intended for after completing the transition process, praises God, "who has made me in his image" – a reference to the description in Genesis of Adam's creation. A final blessing is the Shehechiyanu, traditionally recited to mark special events or notable firsts.

"The midrash… [says] that the adam harishon, the first human being formed in God's likeness, was an androgynous, an intersex person," Rabbi Kukla writes in an introduction. "Hence our tradition teaches that all bodies and genders are created in God's image whether we identify as men, women, intersex or something else."

'Beast of Bolzano' ordered extradited to Italy

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

There's nothing stopping Canada from sending convicted Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert back to Italy immediately, despite his lawyer's intent to appeal a decision upholding his extradition, says Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

"Canada need not wait," Farber told The CJN last week.

Seifert, 83, was remanded to custody at the North Fraser Pretrial Centre after the B.C. Court of Appeal's Aug. 3 ruling.

His lawyer, Doug Christie, has said he intends to appeal the decision to the Supreme Court of Canada, and he was expected to seek bail for his client late last week.

In 2000, Seifert, who once worked in a B.C. lumber mill and resides in East Vancouver, was convicted in absentia by an Italian military court for the rape, torture and murder of nine people at a Nazi concentration transit camp near the Italian town of Bolzano, where he served as an SS prison guard.

Seifert was said to be so cruel that he was dubbed the "Beast of Bolzano." Witnesses at his trial testified that he beat prisoners before shooting them and gouged out one prisoner's eyes.

Most of his victims, Farber said, were partisans, and could well have included Jews.

The Seifert case is especially compelling, he said, because "it is the only extradition case of a Nazi war criminal I know of, anywhere."

Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert remanded after ruling

Although Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel was also extradited to Germany, he was not a Canadian citizen, as Seifert still is, he said.

Farber said he was satisfied with the end result of the case, even though in 1951, Seifert was able to "slip into Canada" and managed to live for more than 55 years in freedom and comfort while his victims "never got to see children or grandchildren."

Seifert's story came to light five decades after he settled in Vancouver in 1951.

According to Farber, documents attesting to Seifert's actions during the war compiled by Italian investigators were stashed away in a nondescript filing cabinet, not to be seen again for another 50 years. Newspapers in Italy called it the "Cabinet of Shame."

As revealed in the CBC TV program Disclosure almost six years ago, Italian military prosecutor Bartolomeo Constantini got hold of the documents, which showed Seifert not only to be a brutal Nazi volunteer, but a particularly enthusiastic one.

He volunteered for the eastern front and ended up at the Bolzano transit camp as a guard as punishment for raping a girl from the town.

Disclosure reported that in November, 2000, Seifert was convicted in Italy and sentenced to life in prison in absentia on the basis of those documents and eyewitness testimony.

The case has wended its way through the Italian and Canadian court systems ever since.

According to a timeline on the CBC's website, Seifert's initial appeal to the Italian military Court of Appeal was rejected in October 2001, and one month after the CBC aired its Disclosure episode on Seifert, the Canadian government launched proceedings in Federal Court seeking Seifert's denaturalization (however, he still remains a Canadian citizen).

Seifert was arrested in May 2001, but he was released without bond later that month pending an extradition hearing.

In September 2002, Christie argued that Seifert was psychologically unfit to stand trial – an argument that was rejected – and one month later, Italy's highest court upheld Seifert's conviction.

In subsequent years, Canadian courts have similarly rejected other arguments put forward to block Seifert's extradition, among them that he is too frail and infirm to live out the rest of his days in an Italian prison.

The B.C. Court of Appeal, in its Aug. 3 ruling, also rejected the argument that Irwin Cotler, because of his record of affiliation with Jewish organizations, was biased when, as federal justice minister, he let stand a B.C. Court of Appeal ruling that Seifert be surrendered to Italian authorities.

Farber told The CJN while it may be natural for the public to feel sympathy for elderly men who face prosecution, or for an old man like Seifert, who has a wife and son and who apparently has lived an honest life in Canada, "they had an ability to grow old. Their victims did not.

"When they were young, they were brutes and thugs and murderers. That's how they should be remembered."

Intern program trains next generation of Jewish leaders

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The first session of the Kohn Summer Intern Program, an eight-week internship program for Jewish students who want the opportunity to work in Jewish organizations, is concluding tomorrow (August 17).

The Kohn program, sponsored by the Irving and Toddy Granovsky family, and Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) Toronto in partnership with Hillel of Greater Toronto, was a huge success, said Lisa Rae, the manager of volunteer and student services at JVS Toronto, and one of the co-ordinators of the program.

She said that she is thrilled about how quickly they were able to put this program together and how many students showed interest.

"We didn't have a lot of lead time, and we were able to place 21 students within various Jewish agencies that came forward and wanted a summer intern. It was nice that we were able to offer it to so many students in the first year. We are looking for funding for next year, and we are looking to expand to up to 30 or 32 students," she said.

The students, who all live within the Greater Toronto Area, were placed with Jewish organizations such as the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living; UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee; Honest Reporting Canada; and Reena, depending on their area of interest.

"The students came with varying backgrounds, so we really were able to offer them something that was of interest to them and in their field," Rae said.

The interns were offered a stipend. Full-time participants received $3,000 and part-time participants, working 18 hours a week, were paid $1,500.

The Kohn program was modelled after a similar program run by JVS in San Francisco, where they have been placing Jewish students with Jewish agencies for 20 years.

Rae said that the program aimed to provide Jewish students with meaningful, hands-on work experience that they can transfer to their next job.

"It's also a mentoring program as well. They are hooked up with Jewish agencies, and they are given some Jewish workshops."

Baruch Lipinsky, a 21-year-old University of Toronto student who is double majoring in history and Canadian studies, is one of the participants.

He is interning part time with the Speakers Action Group, an organization that provides both Jewish and non-Jewish organizations with speakers who give lectures about the importance of supporting Israel and combating anti-Semitism.

Students placed with Jewish organizations

He said the highlight of the program was the weekly leadership seminars that took place Friday mornings, organized by Tilly Shames, Hillel of Greater Toronto associate director.

"We met big professionals in the Jewish community and had a wide range of experiences. We met with top people at UJA, we met with people from various organizations including some organizations that we interned at, and the UJA even put us in their 'fancy room' for sessions, which are usually only reserved for meetings with top donors," Lipinsky said.

"I've learned a lot, attending meetings. I take minutes at meetings, I'm working on a database, I help out a bit in fundraising and I conduct research, and I'm also learning a lot of general work skills. I'm getting a lot out of it," he said.

Lipinsky added that he feels better equipped not only to be a Jewish leader but also as a member of the workplace in general.

"I learned about myself and what it is like to be in the world of work. I also made a lot of friends in the program… I basically know the whole group and we all became Facebook friends," Lipinsky said.

He added that they got along so well, having spent time together each week at the three-hour weekly sessions, that they took it upon themselves to organize a get-together at a restaurant.

"It's nice that they've been able to form these friendships and hopefully they'll keep that over the years and build upon it," Rae said.

She added that she has received a lot of positive feedback not only from the students but also from the agencies themselves.

"The agencies are quite impressed with the level of students that we've sent them."

Rae said that a program such is this is important because it offers youth the opportunity to work with and learn more about their community.

"We want students who really want to gain valuable work experience within the Jewish community and also who want to experience and be exposed to the issues facing them," she said.

Lipinsky said those who apply and get accepted for next year's program, should do what they can to get the maximum experience out of it, because they are the future of the Jewish community.

"This program is designed to get the Jewish community leaders for the next generation. We have to professionalize them, and if we don't start with college, who will be UJA's next generation of donors?" Lipinsky said.

OLMERT MEETS SURVIVORS: Representatives of Holocaust survivors met with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last week to discuss the government's pledge to pay survivors an extra $20 (US) a month above their regular pension benefits, an amount some survivors have called "shameful." New Holocaust text has universal lessons

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Harold Lass and Carole Ann Reed have co-authored a new textbook on Holocaust education for grades 11 and 12 students and their teachers.

Echoes of the Holocaust, a publication of Pacific Educational Press (the publishing house of the faculty of education at the University of British Columbia), was 10 years in the making.

Funding for the project ran dry early on, however, Philip Pinkus – a professor emeritus at UBC, and the man who had originally approached Reed to write the book on behalf of the Vancouver-based Alternatives to Racism Society – facilitated and edited the new publication. It is expected to be available this month.

When Reed – a former social worker who directed the Holocaust Centre of Toronto for six years until 2002 – was approached about writing the book, she was devoting much of her time to her PhD thesis, and called Lass to ask him if he might be interested in taking on the project. It was at his suggestion that the two worked on it together.

Lass, who retired in 1999 as head of the English department at Northern Secondary School, was among Toronto's pioneers in Holocaust education, according to Reed, whose previous book is a historical analysis of the development of Holocaust education in Canada. The two colleagues became friends through their Holocaust-related volunteer work, and they had written articles and presented papers together before the book idea arose.

The new book is "unique in that it takes contemporary issues of discrimination and racism, and parallels events in the Holocaust," said Lass. He noted also that the curriculum is adaptable in terms of how many days teachers want to spend on the issues and the amount of depth they want to go into.

As well as readings on the Holocaust, there are guidelines for teachers, and readings on racism and on discrimination against women, gays and lesbians and people with disabilities. Although Jews were the primary victims of the Holocaust, emphasized Lass, there are universal lessons to be derived from it.

Among them is "the need to stand up and be counted. This is what kids have to learn," said Reed. The poem The Hangman, by Maurice Ogden, drives home the point with the story of a complacent citizen who becomes the hangman's last victim when nobody is left to defend him. Lass said he had used it in his classroom and found it particularly poignant.

Reed stressed that "we don't try and compare tragedies [such as the 1915 Armenian genocide or the 1994 Rwandan genocide]. We really advise against that... You respect every victim of suffering."

Because the book was originally written 10 years ago, the authors – who updated it for publication – wondered at first whether it would still be relevant. Reed found instead that it has become newly relevant in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks that resulted in heightened awareness of racial differences and increased Islamophobia, she said.

Also, she added, she thinks anti-Semitism has become "really an issue," which she would not have predicted a decade ago.

Reed, who is not Jewish, said that for years she "didn't get" why anti-Semitism was still a relevant issue. "We all knew better after the Holocaust. The Holocaust made anti-Semitism not socially acceptable. It exposed it for what it was... [but] all of a sudden anti-Semitism has renewed currency."

The authors are realistic about their target audience. "I don't think this is necessarily going to convert racists," said Lass.

Rather, it's the "passengers" – a term Reed prefers to "bystanders" – who can benefit from "academic backing for what they sense is the right thing," she said.

"'Passengers' are really assenting by refusing to stand up. They're gaining all the privileges you get from conforming... With racism, there's always a benefit to the person who conforms, of being accepted, being one of the group."

Youth book competition helps fight racism

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Mentoring, combating racism, education and creativity– those are the aims of a Toronto writing competition that benefits both elementary and high school students.

To compete in the Morley S. Wolfe Youth Book Competition, called "Challenging Racism and Celebrating Differences," high school students create children's books about racism, diversity and prejudice, and the winning entries are shared with elementary school students.

"Essentially, we've got youth mentoring youth," chair Debbie Kornhauser said about the four-year-old contest.

"I believe that it is the way of the future, if we want our youth to understand how important it is to be tolerant of others, that we have to be able to teach them at as young an age as possible."

The competition is co-ordinated by Toronto Residents in Partnership (TRIP), a not-for-profit group that creates and supports community programs to promote racial, religious, cultural and communal understanding, as well as human rights work.

Morley Wolfe, the man behind both TRIP and the contest, is the former chair of North York's Committee of Community, Race and Ethnic Relations. After the old city of North York was incorporated into the new City of Toronto in 1997, the committee dissolved, but he didn't want its efforts to go to waste.

TRIP has worked in a variety of areas, from being responsible for declaring June elderly abuse awareness month to a book drive for youth who are incarcerated in the youth criminal justice system.

"It's a broad rainbow. It gives us an opportunity to work in just about any area that we feel comfortable with," said Wolfe of TRIP's mandate.

Wolfe served as TRIP's founding president from 2003 to 2006. He said the book contest, which he created and TRIP named in his honour, is especially meaningful, because of its mentoring and learning aspects, and also because of its connections to the corporate world.

Morley Wolfe

The competition is held in concert with an award for better business practices that's given to a small company with a good record in human rights and community programming.

"There's a good connection there, so that the human rights aspect moves with the kids into the corporate sector," Wolfe said.

Wolfe has been has been fighting racism and discrimination since the Depression.

Born in Winnipeg in 1928, he remembers his mother putting together a bag with bread and canned food for the neighbours when he was a child. When they wouldn't accept the charity, Wolfe was sent over to ask to play with the family's son, and he gave the bag to him so the parents wouldn't be embarrassed.

"I learned at a very early age that people in need had to be dealt with in an equitable and fair and just manner," Wolfe said.

Growing up, he dealt with all kinds of racism, from being called a "Christ killer" on the playground and having a swastika carved into his desk to hearing racial slurs about people of a different race.

Let them live in dignity

Holocaust survivors in Israel recently staged a quiet demonstration in front of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office, protesting that a proposed government stipend aimed at supplementing their income was shamelessly meagre. Under the plan, survivors will receive a monthly payment of slightly more than the equivalent of $20 a month this year and $40 by 2009. In reaction to protests, Olmert has promised to review his decision, knowing that the amount offered is truly insulting to survivors.

There are about 240,000 survivors in Israel, of whom 80,000 to 120,000 live near or under the poverty line. Given the unique ordeal through which they passed as Jews during the Nazi era, survivors constitute a class of Israelis who deserve special consideration. These are people who should not be subjected to sleepless nights simply because their wallets are bare or almost bare. They should not have to worry about grocery bills and medical expenses as they grow older and more infirm. They should be able to live out their lives in dignity. The Israeli government, from a strictly moral perspective, is duty-bound to ensure that this will be the case, now and in the future. No excuses can be tolerated. If the Jewish state cannot properly care for survivors, something is terribly amiss.

There is a sensible way out of this mess. Rafi Eitan, a cabinet minister and the leader of the Pensioners party, and Colette Avital, a Labor party member of Knesset, have both suggested that stipends should be paid only to survivors who are destitute. It is a sound idea. The government would then be in a position to beef up payments to survivors who are unable to meet their financial obligations. Survivors in Israel, particularly those who cannot fend for themselves in a country where the cost of living is rising virtually every day, must be treated with the utmost respect. We trust that Olmert will be sensitive to their needs.

Raul Hilberg

Since the downfall of Adolf Hitler's regime in Germany, there has been an outpouring of books – historical works, memoirs and novels – about the Holocaust. Some have been workmanlike and a select few, such as Raul Hilberg's The Destruction of the European Jews, originally published in 1961, have risen to the level of greatness and become classics of the genre. Hilberg's opus will remain timeless because of its scrupulous and objective analysis of the Nazis' machinery of death. It would be hard to understand the Holocaust in all its permutations without reading Hilberg's magisterial account.

Hilberg, who died earlier this month in his home in Vermont, was a Viennese Jew who was forced to leave his home in 1938 after Germany's annexation of Austria. Astonishingly enough, five publishers rejected The Destruction of the European Jews before it finally saw the light of day.

Let it be said that he was a methodical scholar who devoted his life to one of the most important topics in the often horrendous annals of human affairs.

Applauds new hechsher

I, for one, applaud and welcome an additional reliable source of kashrut supervision in the Greater Toronto Area ("New hechsher intended as alternative to COR," CJN, Aug. 9). Jewish unity is not necessarily best served by a one-size-fits-all mentality. Rather, Jewish unity may be best served by recognizing a fabric of diversity.

Diversity can enrich a community when its fabric is woven with relationship, dialogue, trust and respect. On almost every other level, our Jewish community is served and enriched by diversity: several synagogues of the same ideological stream in a close-knit geographical area, the large numbers of shuls and congregations in general, many yeshivot and day schools, multiple kosher pizza establishments on the same block, more than one Jewish political action organization, at least two Jewish clothing collection agencies, etc.

Each year, Kashrus magazine in Brooklyn, N.Y., prints and describes hundreds of kashrut supervision agencies that serve Jewish communities in the United States. Many of these agencies work within the same local confines. None is threatened. To the contrary, healthy competition keeps the playing field honest and fair. When one is uncertain of a particular halachic position taken by a kashrut agency, all one has to do is make a phone call and inquire. If multiple reliable sources of kashrut supervision help to maintain and expand our community's commitment to and supply of kosher establishments, I say baruch haba – a cordial welcome.

U.K. boycotters against Israel's right to exist

C. Peter Herman's letter claims that the proposed U.K. boycotts of Israeli academics is merely a protest against Israeli "policy" and thus not anti-Semitic ("Response to Morton," CJN letter, Aug. 2).

Why single out Israel? There are scores of exponentially worse transgressors in the world than Israel. Why not Sudanese academics due to its government's genocidal policy in Darfur? Or perhaps Chinese academics due to its government's brutal occupation of Tibet and oppression of Falun Gong members, Muslims and other minorities.

He suggests it is Israeli "policy" that the boycotters are against. Are Israel's policies reasonable considering the context? Two years ago, Israel, to jump-start the peace process, unilaterally withdrew from Gaza. This opportunity did not result in responsible governance in Gaza. Instead, property was destroyed and a barrage of Qassam rockets started to fall on Israel.

Why are Palestinian academics not boycotted for their government's use of terror tactics?

The truth is that the U.K. boycotters are not against Israeli policies but against Israel's right to exist. They misperceive Israel as an imperial construct and offer solutions such as a bi-national state, which is a euphemism for dismantling the world's only Jewish state. Boycotting is about vilifying and demonizing Israel in the hope of making it a pariah state and precipitating its demise. This is ideological, not logical, and thus anti-Semitic.

Academics, trade unions target Israel

Israel has been the favourite target of academics and trades unions, as well as the General Assembly of the United Nations, since time immemorial ("Response to Morton," CJN letter, Aug. 2). It is this continuous and singular focus on the Jewish State of Israel that makes their actions anti-Semitic. I will agree with C. Peter Herman that the boycotters are "opposed to Israeli policy, rather than opposed to Jews," once these people launch boycotts against the Muslim states, Christian states or the many other states that are perpetrating crimes against humanity.

Shivah etiquette

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein's shivah advice was extremely pertinent and helpful ("Shivah 101," CJN, Aug 9). Some shivahs appear to have a party atmosphere, with lots of inappropriate chatter and laughter. This may be in part because we are not always sure how to behave when we visit mourners.

Most mourners, as Rabbi Goldstein indicates, would really prefer to talk about the deceased, and some of us might feel awkward about doing this and think perhaps it might bring on more sadness. People in general appear to have a difficult time dealing with death in any situation – note the many euphemisms for death these days and the particularly popular expression "passed away."

Losing a loved one is very painful. Having support during the first few days after a death is what shivah is about, so go, relax, reminisce and don't stay too long.

Shabbat on the Rock

By ERIC MOSES

Erev Shabbat, July 6, 2007

I drove to Toronto's Pearson Airport early Friday morning, leaving behind a beautiful summer day with an expected high of 30 degrees to fly to St. John's to spend Shabbat in Newfoundland. The flight took less than three hours and when I arrived, I was in a new time zone. Newfoundland is 1½ hours ahead of Toronto.

As we prepared to land, the cloud cover and dense fog did not permit any visibility, so I wasn't sure if there was an island in the Atlantic Ocean below. Moments later, we landed in the middle of a torrential downpour. Fortunately, I was greeted at St. John's airport by my friends and members of my shul, Arthur and Margaret Shiff. They knew how ill-prepared a Torontonian would be for the elements of Canada's east coast, so they came equipped with a bright yellow hooded rain slicker. The last time I remember wearing such foul-weather gear was on the Maid of the Mist in Niagara Falls. Needless to say, I gave up fashion for practicality and ditched my leather jacket.

Our first stop was at Georgetown Bakery to pick up bagels and some "Jewish celebration bread." Apparently, the bakery sells it every Friday and it's purchased by Jews and non-Jews alike. Next stop was the shul, the Beth-El Synagogue, which was built in 1959. It's quite amazing that no matter where I go in the world, as soon as I walk into a shul, the feeling of being in a strange land disappears. I walked into the little sanctuary and saw tallitot, Art Scroll chumashim and Birnbaum siddurim – a sign of a traditional shul. The organized Jewish community in St. John's dates back 100 years.

I stayed at the home of the shul's past president, Michael Paul, and his wife Barbara Grandy. Paul recently finished his term as president after 12 years. I wanted to venture out to explore before Shabbat, but the rain and winds were so fierce that I stayed indoors. A pre-Shabbat dinner was held at the home of the current president, Claire Frankel-Salama. She cooked a spectacular dinner for 17 people. The conversation at dinner revolved around the difficulties of obtaining kosher meat, the troubles involved in maintaining a kosher home and the the group's passion and love for their community and shul. Most shocking to me was to hear Jewish people speaking with a Newfoundland accent.

We left for shul by 7:30 in order to be there in time for 8 p.m. davening time. I soon discovered that Newfoundlanders are not in such a rush – 8 really meant 8:30. I davened a traditional Minchah, Kabalat Shabbat and Ma'ariv.

The acoustics in the little shul were magnificent. Nobody seemed to be in a hurry, so I took my time and encouraged the congregation to sing along with me. Upon finishing, people approached me with tears in their eyes to thank me. One older woman went so far as to tell me that she had never heard a cantor in her entire life.

The shul's membership is made up largely of doctors, professors from Memorial University, businesspeople and even one meteorologist.

They are fortunate to have in their midst a very knowledgeable Sephardi Jew, Messod Salama, a professor of Spanish at MU. Messod has one of the largest private collections of Sephardi recordings and manuscripts in Canada. He takes pride in teaching and incorporating Sephardi melodies into the davening, and in preserving the shul's traditions according to Halachah.

After services, he gave a brilliant dvar Torah, incorporating motifs from the parshiot of Korach, Chukat, Balak and Pinchas, the parshah of the week. An Oneg Shabbat followed, with treats baked and laid out beautifully by the ladies – all volunteers. Unlike a Toronto Oneg, this one was served on china dishware. I was impressed.

The most moving part of the evening was the singing of Shalom Aleichem at the Oneg. I began the singing, but the 32 people in attendance sang with such enthusiasm and power that they could have easily been mistaken for 200. I was so moved that I felt the tears of emotion well up in my eyes, and I found myself unable to continue singing.

Toronto cantor Eric Moses finds 'home' in Newfoundland.

As my first day in Newfoundland drew to a close, I donned my foul-weather gear and dodged the puddles as I walked home through the pouring rain.

Shabbat morning, July 7, 2007

The next day, I woke up early and prepared myself vocally as I do every Shabbat. I looked out the window and, alas, it was dark, windy and raining. Shacharit was scheduled for 9 a.m., but as I learned from the previous evening, that really meant 9:30. Nobody seemed in a hurry. I was greeted enthusiastically by congregants, who informed me that my new CD, Moses Live, had been aired on CBC Radio on Friday night and Saturday morning. Who would have ever imagined hearing chazzanut on CBC radio in Newfoundland.

I finished Shacharit and met the shul's ba'al koreh, Ernie Mauskopf, an 82-year-old Holocaust survivor who is originally from Hungary. He read the parshah so flawlessly that he would be the envy of many Toronto shuls.

This Shabbat was very significant in St. John's, because the Jewish community was also enjoying a visit from the Israeli Ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, and his wife, Dalia. He recited the prayer for the State of Israel and the Mi Sheberach for Israeli soldiers. At the rear of the shul were the ambassador's two RCMP bodyguards, quietly sitting and wearing kippot.

At the congregational lunch following the service, Baker addressed the congregation and spoke passionately about the co-operation and support for Israel that he has received from Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the Conservative government.

It was such a special day in the shul that those in attendance didn't want it to end. We continued singing zmirot and more zmirot with complete congregational participation. Finally, it was time for Birkat Hamazon, and I was proud to ask Baker to lead us.

Then it was time to return outdoors, and much to my dismay, it was still raining, only stronger than before.

After my "Shabbos shluf," I was ready for my Shabbos walk. Finally, the rain had stopped. My host, Michael Paul, took me on a 2½-hour walk and proudly showed me some of the landmarks in North America's oldest city – St. John's beautiful harbour, Signal Hill, Fort Amherst and the lieutenant governor's mansion.

He explained the general differences in construction on the island. Since brick is so expensive and not manufactured in Newfoundland, most of the homes are made of wood covered with clapboard in an array of different colours. And while Toronto is flat, St. John's is like San Francisco, with lots of steep hills.

We returned to my hosts' home in time for seudah shlishit, followed by Havdalah.

Shabbat ended at 10 p.m. In Toronto, that would signal one hour of television and time for bed.

Not in Newfoundland!

The night was still young, and a minyan of Jews descended upon one of St. John's favourite watering holes, O'Reilly's Irish Newfoundland Pub. It was some "melaveh malkah," featuring local talent singing traditional Irish Newfoundland favourites and drinking east coast beer. I felt as if I was in Dublin. Was I really still in Canada?

Sunday, July 8, 2007

On Sunday morning, I awoke to a windy but sunny day (I finally ditched the rain gear) and visited Cape Spear, the easternmost point in North America, which is about a 20-minute drive from St. John's. Several years ago, the Beth-El Synagogue created a beautiful tradition. Each year at Slichot time, congregants daven a sunrise Shacharit service at Cape Spear. The photos of men in tallit and tfillin blowing shofar at the place in North America closest to Jerusalem are proudly displayed in the shul. The shul also has posters of Israel hanging around its social hall, as well as a beautiful painting of a chassidic Jew on permanent loan to the shul from Memorial University. The community has its own cemetery, and Paul and his wife lead the chevrah kadishah.

Sadly, I had to bid farewell to my new friends on Sunday. It was bittersweet, as they knew that by next Shabbat, the excitement would be gone and there was no certainty that there would be a minyan in shul. It was such an uplifting experience for them to have a minyan of 30-plus people and the infrequent opportunity to read from the Torah. Regrettably, the problem facing the East Coast, as well as other smaller Canadian communities, is the lack of Jewish people.

My trip to Newfoundland inspired me to try to reach out to other outlying Jewish communities that are struggling to survive. The Toronto Council of Hazzanim, in conjunction with UIA Canada Small Communities Division, is planning to have a group of chazzanim perform a concert in a different small community each year. This initiative will give smaller Jewish communities exposure in the broader community, in addition to providing them with an excellent fundraising opportunity.

We are also planning to send a cantor annually to Cuba to lead Shabbat services and to deliver much needed pharmaceuticals and supplies. In Havana, the shul also serves as the community pharmacy.

I was invited to Newfoundland to lead shabbat services at Beth-El Synagogue by my congregants and friends, Arthur and Margaret Shiff, who sponsored the weekend together with the Atlantic Jewish Council and Beth-El. In the 100-year history of Newfoundland's Jewish community, services have rarely been led by a chazzan.

Today, the Beth\-El has 25 member families. My experience there reminded me of my childhood in Sudbury, Ont., a tiny Jewish community that also has 25 Jewish families. I lived in Sudbury until I was 13. I was always the only Jew in my school, and the synagogue was the only possible place to express myself Jewishly. It was largely due to my experiences in a small community that I chose to become a chazzan and to serve others.

Newfoundland was quite similar to Sudbury, albeit with ts own unique flair and Old World charm. My Judaism is strengthened by the resolve and devotion of the Jews of Newfoundland. My Shabbat was enriched by their passion and their singing. If you plan to visit Newfoundland and would like to attend services at Beth El Synagogue in St. John's or eat a kosher meal, please contact Michael Paul at mpaul@mun.ca.

Thinking outside the box

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Jews in the Diaspora care much more about Israel than Israeli Jews care about the Diaspora, and the asymmetry may lead to irreparable damage.

The more Israelis ignore the rest of the Jewish world, the more Diaspora Jews will turn their attention to other matters. The relationship is already more fragile than it used to be. That's the thrust of a recent article in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz by Yehezkel Dror, the distinguished Israeli political scientist and public figure.

Apart from practical proposals about joint educational, social and economic ventures calculated to narrow the gap, Dror also advocates "explicit and declared recognition of the right of Jews in the Diaspora to criticize Israeli policies." If Israel is to be the state of the Jewish people, all Jews must be able to express opinions and espouse causes that challenge any government in power.

For much of my life, I have acted on this principle.

Since only citizens should be able to vote in elections, the time has come to revive the idea that Jews combine their next visit to Israel with acquiring Israeli citizenship. Dror calls for "a radical change in the conception of aliyah, with encouragement to partial aliyah, including multiple residences in Israel and in the Diaspora." For the last seven years, my wife and I, together with other Canadian Jews, have done precisely that.

Many of us reside in Jerusalem. Dror wants to make the city "the cultural capital of Judaism and the Jewish People."

It makes sense. Jerusalem brings Jews closer to their heritage and their people than any other place in the world.

Dror's proposal would benefit both the State of Israel and Jews everywhere. For as hard as Diaspora leaders try to promote synagogue affiliation, Jewish day schools, clubs and summer camps, the combined impact on our children and grandchildren is limited. Time spent in Israel does much more for most of them.

Unlike Ben-Gurion and others of his generation who believed that severing links with the Diaspora and living in Israel is the way to stay Jewish, nowadays many of us think differently. The old approach seems both unrealistic and undesirable, because the strength and viability of the Jewish people depend not on narrow nationalism, but on the interplay between the sovereign centre and the geographic periphery.

New thinking and resolute action are called for. Both are in short supply.

Whereas those engaged in business and technology dream bold dreams and realize many of them, theoreticians of Judaism and its political leaders seem incapable of thinking outside the box. Yehezkel Dror deserves our gratitude for alerting us to the danger of mouthing obsolete clichés and urging us to think imaginatively and act courageously.

An end and a beginning

Jonah Brotman in Ottawa

As the summer continues and more friends return home from exotic locales with exciting tales of travel, one question continues to arise: "What next?"

With the completion of undergraduate university studies, the clear path has given way to infinite forks in the road. Jumping through hoops of government-mandated formal education has taken 18 of my first 22 years in this world. From kindergarten to Grade 12 and through university, the strict regulations of a constraining curriculum and standardized testing have attempted to mould me into an upstanding adult and model citizen.

With the pre-structured stages of life out of the way, a blank slate of newfound freedom emerges that is liberating, yet equally daunting. The choose-your-own-adventure years of my life now kick into high gear.

Finding jobs, paying off debts and saving money all seem so stereotypical. I could work for minimum wage in Toronto, teach English in Asia or go back to school for a master's degree, the increasingly necessary marker of academic achievement. Each choice has positive and negative factors warranting serious consideration.

Everyone encounters similarly distressing situations. New homes, old mortgages, career advancement and retirement – these are some of the choices that determine our future. Thankfully, I can avoid most of them for quite some time.

Decision-making is often swayed by one's closest influences. Friends tell me to travel and parents tell me to plan ahead, probably to avoid future late-night international money transfers. Even my grandparents recently joined the chorus by gently nudging me to find a "path." The path for their generation involved living through the Great Depression, World War II and the post-war baby boom to the current day. That must have been a pretty crazy roller coaster. Mine will just involve iPods and Facebook instead of jukeboxes and sockhops.

For my generation, the "global village" is not just a concept on the pages of famous Canadian Marshall McLuhan. For us, the Internet has connected everyone, all the time, anywhere.

The emerging standard increasingly tends to move away from the straight path of assured comfort toward one of lifelong dynamic change. The average worker today will change jobs three to five times throughout the typical working years. Even "typical working years" have been abolished by baby-boomers not ready to retire at the sprightly age of 65. Work stimulates the brain and keeps the body young – so kudos, but only until I want the job.

A friend recently introduced me to a 32-year-old business manager who complained that his six-figure salary and downtown office failed to satisfy his needs. I was shocked. He seemed so successful and happy.

"I want something different," he said. "I want to be fulfilled, like you."

I was puzzled. Am I fulfilled? This is a tough question. He has comfort, luxury and stability, while I have freedom, adventure and mobility. He envied my NGO work in Africa; I envied his air-conditioned office job. He regrets his past, while I anticipate my future.

One thing that is important to remember, though, is that by dreaming of the future and remembering the past, we neglect the present. Pop culture historian Chuck Klosterman once noted that he spent all his time reminiscing about past loves and imagining future ones. And it left him with nothing but the ephemeral.

Whether one delves into past, present or future, life is a journey worth enjoying. Yet finding value in one's life only really comes with reflection. The easiest time to reflect seems to be at a conclusion. Whether the end of school, a longtime job, a friendship or life itself, finality is attained through contemplation and introspection. The grand scheme of our lives will become clear eventually, or so we all hope.

This being the final instalment of my contribution as a CJN campus columnist, I can reflect and be thankful for the input and praise that came from friends, family and anyone within the Canadian Jewish sphere.

The most important lesson I have learned from all of this: more people know and care about you than you think. So be true to yourself and be kind to others. Genuine fulfilment in life will follow.

A final reflection

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

Ever since I began as the Halifax columnist for The CJN a year ago, I have been thinking about what it means for me – a transient "import" to this region – to represent Halifax for readers across the country. Given that this is my final column, I think it is fitting to share some of these reflections, as they have evolved throughout the year.

Because of its geography and its size, Atlantic Canada is, in many ways, viewed by the rest of the country as on the fringes. This has both advantages and drawbacks. On the one hand, being slightly off the radar screen provides for a low-key, unpretentious environment. It means that there are many hidden gems to be discovered in daily life. On the other hand, being out of sight often leads to a portrayal of Atlantic Canada that is slightly caricatured and one-dimensional. As with most places, it is hard to get a sense of Atlantic Canada until one has lived there and experienced day-to-day life. It is hard, and even unfair, to give an outsider's perspective.

One of the questions I received recently from one of my local readers was: "Don't you find it strange being the Halifax writer when you yourself grew up in Ontario and are sure to leave Halifax once you have your degree?"

My answer is yes and no. It is true that I am not a native, and therefore, my view of the city will always be through the eyes of a newcomer. But this is not a responsibility that I take lightly. I have done my best to give only my perspective on the city and to make it apparent that my view is not a comprehensive one. I think that the starting point for any columnist is the people, events and lifestyle that he or she is familiar with. Where possible, I tried to present a nuanced view, showing the variety and complexity of life here.

For those who live in the region, it is blatantly obvious when an outsider fails to provide anything but a one-dimensional perspective on life in Atlantic Canada. A recent example of this is the July 28 issue of the Globe and Mail, which featured an article titled "The Lost Tribe of the Atlantic." This article painted a rather bleak picture of the Jewish community of Atlantic Canada, which, it suggests, has fallen from its glory days and needs a grand solution to rescue it.

Luckily, things are more complex than that. Anyone who has spent time in the region (the author, it should be noted, is from Toronto) knows that the above thesis is far from true. In addition to containing some factual errors (for example, it claimed that there are only two rabbis in the region, when, in fact, there are five), the article failed to mention the many aspects of vibrant Jewish life in the region: how Halifax has become a hub for Jewish students, whose numbers exceed 500; how Camp Kadimah provides an exciting and important community for youth both inside and outside the region; how religious and cultural events throughout the year are well-attended and meaningful; and how the Jewish communities that do exist throughout the Atlantic provinces are friendly and welcoming.

The author's focus was purely on numbers and the places, such as Glace Bay, where these numbers have dropped. A detached perspective like this certainly does not do any justice to the richness of the region.

Interestingly enough, for me, the very process of writing about life in Halifax – stepping back and reflecting on it and how I should tell its story to others – allowed me to take more ownership of this place and my life there.

Though I have left the region, at least for now, I do have a window into life in Atlantic Canada, and living there is an experience I will take with me as I move on to the next stage of my life. I take a special pleasure and joy in telling others that I went to school there, and I hope to continue being an ambassador of sorts for the region. Writing this column has given me my first chance to be such an ambassador and I am grateful for the opportunity to share my thoughts with you. Zay gezunt!

The Kirshner File

Cynical anti-Semite terrorized French Jews

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Nicknamed "Hitler's parrot," Louis Darquier de Pellepoix held the title of commissioner for Jewish affairs in Vichy France from May 1942 until February 1944. Under his watch, Jews were reduced to second-class citizens, looted of their property, forced to wear the yellow star and dispatched to Auschwitz. But Darquier, a self-important, hotheaded, high-living veteran of World War I who favoured a monocle and abandoned his first daughter, was more than an anti-Semite.

As Carmen Callil observes in her thoroughly chilling biography, Bad Faith: A Forgotten History of Family, Fatherland and Vichy France (Random House), Darquier exploited the wholesale persecution of Jews for financial gain. Although the venom of anti-Semitism ran deep in his veins, he was essentially a con man who was primarily interested in feathering his nest.

Born in 1897 in the southern French town of Cahors, the son of a left-wing official who backed the Jewish army officer Alfred Dreyfus during his nightmarish travails, Darquier claimed that he knew "absolutely nothing about Jews" until adulthood. But soon enough, he was a bitter, outspoken anti-Semite. At a meeting in 1937, he declared, "We must, with all urgency, resolve the Jewish problem, whether by expulsion or massacre."

In Callil's estimation, Darquier was greatly influenced by two of the demigods of French anti-Semitism – Edouard Drumont, the author of La France Juive (1886) and the publisher of La Libre parole, and Charles Maurras, the philosopher who rejected parliamentary democracy and railed against Jews, Protestants and Freemasons. But Henry Coston, a journalist who was active in Action Française, an anti-Semitic organization,was another significant figure in Darquier's conversion.

During the inter-war period, Darquier basically earned a living as a city counsellor and deputy secretary general of Le Jour, a far right daily newspaper published in Paris. But above all else, he was a violence-prone rabble-rouser obsessed by Jews.

When Leon Blum, a Jew, became the prime minister of France in 1936, Darquier called for "a debate against Jewish tyranny and the invasion of foreigners." By then, as Callil points out, his views were fixed. He believed that Jews who had arrived in France before 1918 should be expelled, that remaining Jews should not be permitted to hold public office, and that their influence in all spheres should be strictly limited. A racial anti-Semite who was fixated on blooodlines, Darquier was a French Nazi who admired Julius Streicher, the publisher of the pornographically anti-Jewish scandal sheet, Der Sturmer, one of Hitler's favourite newspapers.

Even after his induction into the army, a day before France declared war on Germany in September 1939, Darquier could not keep his mouth shut. A lieutenant in an anti-tank unit, he was fined 500 francs for insulting a Jewish soldier. Subsequently, he was heard saying that France was merely fighting "for the Jews of the entire world, while they find safe jobs and continue to run their businesses on our backs."

One can imagine that Darquier was extremely pleased when Vichy France enacted the Statut des Juifs in October 1940. These anti-Semitic decrees, which were more stringent than even the German conquerors requested, defined Jews by race and subjected them to a panoply of restrictions as well as police roundups. Xavier Vallat, the first commissioner for Jewish affairs, implemented these edicts with zeal and supervised the first roundup of Jews in May 1941. But since Vallat tried to protect "old" French Jews from the worst excesses, the German command sacked him. The Nazis chose Darquier as Vallat's successor, saying that he had "the correct conception of the Jewish question."

They were right, of course. Darquier did not distinguish between French and foreign Jews. All Jews had to go. Writing in the Berlin magazine Die Judenfrage four months after succeeding Vallat, he expressed contempt for the "maudlin sentimentality" of Vichy's anti-Jewish legislation, and went one step further by claiming that "the French administration, which still includes many Jews in its ranks, opposes me with all its might."

Despite his rhetoric, Darquier was a disappointment to the Germans. He was quarrelsome and alienated staff, and there was an atmosphere of sexual impropriety and financial skulduggery in his office.

Darquier and his cynical minions were notorious for accepting immense bribes from wealthy Jews seeking exemptions from anti-Semitic laws. "If such Jews paid him enough, he would turn a blind eye," writes Callil, who adds that Darquier's principal concern was "the legal and illegal appropriation of Jewish assets," known otherwise as "economic Aryanization."

His shenanigans notwithstanding, Darquier remained a model anti-Semite who instilled fear in the hearts of of his enemies. On June 7, 1942, French and foreign Jews in the occupied German zone were henceforth required to wear a yellow star. And in July of that fateful year, he supervised the Vel' d'Hiv' roundup of nearly 13,000 Parisian Jews, almost one-third of whom were children. They were sent to Auschwitz. Under Darquier's reign of terror, thousands more Jews were shipped to death camps in Poland.

Darquier was particularly interested in hounding three categories of Jews who, he argued, had gotten off lightly: Jews who had taken refuge in the Italian occupation zone; war vets and French citizens who had circumvented the Statut des Juifs; and half-Jews and hidden Jews who had outwitted him.

Justifying his strong position, Darquier said, "The Jewish problem is not specifically a Jewish problem. It faces all nations and has taken on urgent proportions in France. Germany has simply been the first country in the modern era to provide a governmental solution to the problem… the French government [must] do the same."

Louis Darquier de Pellepoix

In a bid to ape the Nazis, Darquier proposed the denaturalization of French Jews. But Marshal Henri-Philippe Pétain, the leader of the Vichy regime, stonewalled. Pétain accepted his proposal in principle, but refused to sign his bill. He urged Darquier to concentrate on foreign Jews. Complaining about Pétain's lack of commitment, Darquier threatened to resign. But by that juncture, the Germans, fed up with his improprieties and self-serving practices, were already itching to dismiss him.

He was indeed fired, but Darquier could take credit for the murder of some 75,000 Jews, French and foreigners, during the Holocaust.

With the fall of the Vichy regime, Darquier and his dissolute Australian wife, Myrtle, a bigamist, took refuge in a hotel the Germans had frequented. As France was liberated from the Nazi yoke, 9,000 collaborators were summarily executed before special courts could be established.

Darquier was spared, though reports of his assassination abounded. Stuffing him into the trunk of his car, Darquier's brother, Rene, drove him to the Pyrenees, where he was picked up by fascist sympathizers and spirited into Spain in September 1944.

War criminals like Darquier found a haven in Franco's Spain, which Callil caustically describes as "a regime entirely free of the errors of democracy, socialism and communism."

Darquier felt at home in Spain, which had been neutral during the war. His friend, Jose de Lequerica, who had been the Spanish ambassador to Vichy, was now Spain's foreign minister. Darquier was also protected by Antonio Baroso y Sanchez-Guerra, a Franco confidant. Darquier was soon teaching French at a Madrid school, and in 1946, he received a Spanish passport under the name of Jean Esteve Roussel.

A year later, having been declared guilty of "collusion with agents of a foreign power," France sentenced him to death in absentia and withdrew his French citizenship.

Nevertheless, Darquier continued to rant and rave about Jews. As Callil puts it, "He remained combative and extravagant to the end, and the deranged words he had borrowed from the Protocols of the Elders of Zion never changed."

In 1978, two years before his death, he granted an interview to a journalist from l'Express in Paris. In his usual style, he lied about his role and denied the Holocaust.

"The Final Solution is an invention, pure and simple," he said, adding that he had nothing to do with the Vel' d'Hiv' roundup, and that he attempted "to make the situation of French Jews as comfortable as possible."

The interview ended with this question: "And do you sometimes have regrets? Remorse?"

Darquier replied: "Regrets for what? I don't understand your question."

Inclusive Public Education: A Cross-Canada Perspective

Ontario has much to learn from other provinces

By DAVID ENGEL
UJA FEDERATION

In the debate about inclusive public education, a lot of discussion centres on how schools are funded in other provinces, and the impact bringing faith-based schools into the system will have on the quality of education in public schools. We can look to the realities in other provinces to find some answers.

Faith-based schools in Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia all receive various levels of public funding in exchange for meeting specific government requirements, such as following provincial curriculum, government inspections, student testing, and standardized administration procedures.

There are Jewish day schools in all of these provinces except Saskatchewan. Students in these schools have benefited in a way their Ontario counterparts have not – they receive excellent education in both general studies and Jewish studies that reflect their family values, but their families do not face the heavy financial burden of having to pay for it entirely on their own.

Bringing faith-based schools into the public education system will enhance learning and diverstiy.

What hasn't happened in these provinces is a significant drop in the quality of education, either in the secular public schools, or in the Jewish day schools. If anything, extending public funding to faith-based schools had made public education stronger.

Take the example of the Edmonton District School Board. While every school in this innovative board follows the standard provincial curriculum, many offer special programs to enhance the school day and attract students and their families based on what is most important to them. Students in every grade are tested annually across the board. Their scores are published and the results are used to improve teaching. Rather than fearing competition from private faith-based schools, the Edmonton board embraces them – it now includes two Christian schools and a Jewish day school. Students are free to attend any school in the board.

What has all of this accomplished? Students receive high-quality, publicly funded education that meets strict provincial requirements and still provides students of faith a place to learn in an environment that reflects their values. Moreover, this model has led to higher academic achievement among students across the board. By challenging students in a variety of ways, grades have improved and drop-out rates have fallen across the board, improving public education for all students.

Ontario can learn much from examining the success of Edmonton's school board – most importantly, that it need not fear a drop in the quality of education should faith-based schools be included in the public system. On the contrary, bringing these schools into public education will enhance learning and diversity.

Keeping Judaism alive in Siberia

Growing up in Siberia, Anna Yelsky knew she was Jewish, but lacked the resources necessary to develop a strong Jewish identity. When she was eight, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner – opened an office in her city, and Anna was excited to become an active member of the Jewish community that slowly evolved. Today, Anna works at a JAFI office and uses the education she received from the Jewish Agency as a springboard for her work. She credits JAFI and its partners around the world for providing services throughout the FSU that enable the region's Jews to maintain a connection to their roots and to establish a connection with Israel.

"I loved the activities at the Jewish Agency; learning about Jewish holidays, traditions and engaging in cultural activities," says Anna, now 22, about her participation in Jewish Agency programs during her youth.

Siberia's Anna Yelsky credits The Jewish Agency For Israel (JAFI) - UJA Federation's overseas partner - with her sense of Jewish identity.

Anna quickly became a permanent participant in Orsk's growing Jewish communal life as a dynamic youth group leader. She was chosen to be a counselor at the Jewish Agency Summer Camp in Samara, where she met peers from all over Russia, as well as Israeli counselors her age. Together, they imparted a positive Israel-centered learning experience to Jewish children of all ages.

Anna teaches Hebrew and lectures at Jewish Agency seminars held throughout Russia. She recently married, and moved with her husband to St. Petersburg, where she works at the Jewish Agency's office. She and her husband speak about the possibility of making aliyah, but have not made a final decision.

"I owe my strong sense of Jewish identity to the Jewish Agency," says Anna. "I cannot imagine what my life would have been like had I not walked into their office fourteen years ago."

Sowing the seeds of tax planning today can reap rewards

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

With Bell Canada stock set to go private in 2008, investors who are sitting on holdings with significant accrued capital gains have an opportunity to do some proactive tax planning.

Investors who hold Bell Canada shares which have appreciated substantially outside of a tax-sheltered plan such as an RRSP or RRIF may face a huge tax liability come early 2008, when their stock is bought out from under them.

But, if you are philanthropically-inclined, sowing the seeds of tax planning today can reap huge rewards in the form of tax savings in 2007 and potentially, for up to five years ahead.

That's because last year's federal budget completely eliminated the capital gains tax on donations of publicly-traded shares to registered charities. By combining the advantages of donations "in-kind" with the additional advantages of the donation tax credit system, you can put into place a significant strategic charitable giving plan that will save you tax now and in the future.

Let's take a look at an example.

Jamie Golombek

Daniel owns $30,000 of BCE shares that he inherited years ago from his great aunt. At the time of his great aunt's death, the fair market value of the shares was only $6,000 which became Daniel's adjusted cost base (ACB) or tax cost.

Daniel generally donates about $5,000 annually to charity, divided equally amongst four of his favourite causes. Given that BCE shares won't be around this time next year, however, he may wish to act quickly to take advantage of this tax planning opportunity.

Let's say he donates his entire $30,000 of BCE stock this year by giving $7,500 worth of shares to each of his four selected charities. He will immediately save the capital gains tax on the $24,000 accrued gain, equal to about $5,000 of tax, assuming a marginal capital gains tax rate of approximately 20%.

But that's not all. Daniel will receive four donation receipts totaling $30,000 which will produce a tax savings to him of at least 40%, regardless of which tax bracket he's in. That's because any donations beyond the first $200 annually are eligible for the donation tax credit, generally at the top federal and provincial tax rates, making them worth virtually the same to all Canadians, regardless of income level.

While the charities benefit this year from the increased donations, Daniel can either choose to claim the entire $30,000 donation credit on his 2007 return or he can spread out his donation credits by claiming them over the next five years, the maximum carry-forward period allowed for charitable donations. Naturally, he would only do so if he was unable to use the full value of the donation credit in the current year to reduce his tax payable to zero.

So, is it hard to do? Based on personal experience, as long as you're dealing with a major charity, it's a piece of cake. Most charities have been set up to accept donations in-kind now for over a decade, when such donations were first given preferential tax treatment.

An eye-opening mission to Ethiopia and Israel

UJA Federation volunteer has firsthand look at dollars at work

From July 8 – 16, Toronto's David Spiro, a long-time UJA Federation volunteer and currently the co-chair of the United Jewish Communities (UJC) National Young Leadership Cabinet and a member of the UIA Federations Canada Board of Directors, participated in a special UJC fact-finding mission to Ethiopia and Israel where he observed how UJA Federation funds were helping those in need. Below, Spiro shares his observations.

By DAVID SPIRO

Having had an opportunity to reflect on my recent mission to Ethiopia and Israel, one of the most important aspects of the trip was seeing first-hand the incredible impact that UJA Federation dollars have on the lives of those in need. As I prepare for my canvassing over the next few months for UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign for Our Jewish Future, I was buoyed by what I witnessed, and I am now even more motivated to do what I can to ensure the success of this year's vital campaign.

As terrorist rockets began striking Sderot earlier this year, UJA Federation, along with its overseas agency, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), began moving children out of the city and away from the danger to summer camps in safer parts of the country. As part of this mission, I had the opportunity to visit one of those camps. The opportunity for these kids to play outdoors is so important. It was truly inspirational to see how we're giving kids relief from the rocket barrage that they face every day. Their smiling faces and laughter made it clear that we're making a difference in their lives – and that's what it's really all about.

It is by going on missions that we appreciate the effect of the careful planning that goes into the allocation of our dollars that are devoted to Israel and overseas needs. We are grateful for the work of those who have devoted their time and energy to ensuring that the projects we fund are carefully conceived, stewarded and monitored in order to have the maximum possible impact on those in need. We also have the privilege of witnessing the amazing dedication of those who devote their lives to helping others under difficult circumstances. The self-sacrifice of an individual such as Dr. Rick Hodes, the Medical Director in Ethiopia for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, is simply awe-inspiring. Our dollars help him do his work of healing the sick and strengthening the weak.

BIENVENUE A LA MAISON

Toronto's David Spiro greets Ethiopian olim at Ben Gurion Airport.

With JAFI, UJA Federation is able to provide classes at the Israeli Embassy compound in Addis Ababa where the Falash Mura learn for the first time how to use a stove, a fridge, a toilet and even a toothbrush and toothpaste so they can begin to take baby steps to build new lives for themselves in 21st century Israel.

Among other things, UJA Federation helps to sustain vital remedial programs that assist young Ethiopian children who are struggling to keep up in school with their Israeli classmates because they don't have the kind of educational stimulation at home that we take for granted. And finally by way of example, we assist promising Ethiopian teenagers and young adults who need that extra bit of training and encouragement in order to successfully complete career and vocational programs that will help pave the way for their full integration into Israeli society. At the end of the day, we are helping our fellow Jews fulfill their potential – and what more deserving cause is there than that?

David Spiro is a Toronto lawyer.

JAFI provides summer camp for over 8,000 Sderot youth

Since July 1, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's overseas partner - has been providing day and overnight camp opportunities to the 8,200 youth between the ages of 6 and 17 living in Sderot and the surrounding area, taking them to camps or on field trips outside the zone which has come under continuous rocket attacks from the Gaza Strip.

On any given day during July and August, there have been some 4,000 children and teens participating in a myriad of JAFI coordinated camp activities. This summer's camp project, To Sderot With Love, cost $4.79 million, funded by the United Jewish Communities, the Federations of North America including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, United Israel Appeal of Canada, Keren Hayesod, the IDB Group and Israeli donors, with the cooperation of Israel's largest daily newspaper Yediot Ahronoth and it's YNET internet site.

Youngsters from the Sderot area enjoy life at a JAFI summer camp.

"On any given day there is a camp activity available to each and every child in the Sderot area, which takes place out of the range of the missiles," says Yael Raz. JAFI's coordinator of the summer camps.

Camp activities include visits to Israel's nature reserves, amusement and water parks, zoos and the safari, entertainment performances, a stand up comedy club, even a miniature American Indian village was set up in a camp near Beersheva – all these on top of routine camp activities.

Campers recently took a three-day tour of Jerusalem, introducing the children to major sites, in celebration of the 40th year of the capital's unification. Camps also bring children to the north of Israel, with a variety of nature-oriented activities, including hiking and kayaking; a camp group also went to Eilat.

"The children are so happy and their parents are so grateful – we get thank you letters every day," Raz said.

Tamir Abouksis, aged 14, from Sderot is one of the children participating. He was wounded two years ago by Kassam shrapnel.

"The situation in Sderot is very difficult," he said. "It is impossible to live like this. I am scared to leave the house, and when I walk in the street I am always mentally lining up potential places where I can take cover."

Gearing up for Our Jewish Future

Members of the 2008 UJA Federation Executive Cabinet recently made their way to the cottage of Judy and Larry Tanenbaum for the annual Leadership Retreat – chaired by Michael Feldman and Sherry Firestone - in preparation for the August launch of The Campaign for Our Jewish Future.

More than 75 lay leaders were treated to a variety of exceptional and passionate speakers who covered topics that helped to explain the importance of this year's campaign.

The Campaign for Our Jewish Future, chaired by Lesley Binstock Offman and Morris Perlis, will hold its official community launch on Wednesday, August 29 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, and will feature actor/comedian Larry Miller as keynote speaker. For information about the campaign launch, please call 416.631.5700

Educating youth about racism

He said mentoring and teaching youth about racism is extremely important, and he's glad he had such mentors in his parents.

"[They] told me those things were wrong, and if you ever get the chance to do something about it, do it. Don't just talk about it, do it. For the past 50 or 60 years, I've been involved in this kind of programming, or this kind of committee, and trying to make the world a better place to live in," Wolfe said.

Wolfe was a founding member of B'nai Brith of Canada's League for Human Rights and became the national chair for intercultural dialogue. After an almost 40-year legal career, he served as a justice of the peace and continues to serve as a deputy judge in small claims court.

It is crucial to teach youth about racism in elementary school, when they are most likely to form their opinions and ideas, Wolfe said.

"They have to understand what racism is, and they have to understand what discrimination is, and they have to understand what diversity is," he said.

> 'They have to understand what discrimination is, and they have to understand what diversity is'

"You have to implant that in the kids. Once they have an idea of what it is, they have to understand how it affects other people."

The book competition aims to do just that. The top three winners – who are named by a panel of judges that includes community leaders, educators, journalists and editors – receive cash prizes. There are also three honourable mentions.

The competition has already seen success in the last four years, said Kornhauser, citing teachers who choose to make it part of their curriculum, and the positive effects of mentoring on the younger children.

She said that when Windfields Junior High students read their entries to elementary students, for example, the younger children asked for autographs.

"It's been a very positive thing and just a brilliant idea," she said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
>
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
>
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The Gooderham-Weizmann connection

By HOWARD ALTER

Special to the CJN

What possible link might there be between Toronto's most recent cultural and tourist destination, the Distillery Historical District, and the birth of the State of Israel?

An article on the Canadian Home Workshop Magazine website about Canadian inventions credits Albert Edward Gooderham, owner of the Gooderham and Worts distillery in the early 1900s, with having created a method of producing the solvent acetone from grain. I was surprised by this statement, recalling having once read a different account of this invention in a biography of one of Zionism's greatest leaders.

Guest Voice

Puzzled and intrigued by the seeming discrepancy, a little research led me to discover an interesting convergence of the two stories.

In 1916, a brilliant chemist at Manchester University in England discovered a bacterial fermentation process for synthesizing acetone, which was in desperate demand during World War I for the manufacture of explosives. Formerly, acetone could only be manufactured from wood, of which there wasn't enough in all the forests of Europe to supply the armament needs of the British army.

The scientist, an avidly Zionist Jew of Russian origin named Chaim Weizmann, was brought to London, where he explained to the First Lord of the Admiralty, Winston Churchill, and to the minister of munitions, David Lloyd George, that his process would produce the necessary tons of acetone if large supplies of corn and a sufficiently large fermentation and distillation plant could be found.

The British colony of Canada had the corn, and the largest distillery in the British Empire was in Toronto. So this is when Gooderham successfully redirected his massive complex on the shores of Lake Ontario, under the title "British Acetones Toronto Ltd.," to use the aptly named bacterium clostridium acetobutylicum weizmann to create the new product according to the Jewish scientist's method.

With the first quantities of acetone arriving in the United Kingdom from Toronto in early 1917, Weizmann's supervision of the mass production of synthetic acetone for the Allies opened doors for him in British government circles, where he served as an eloquent and persuasive spokesperson for Zionism.

When Lloyd George left the munitions ministry to become prime minister, under whom Arthur Balfour became foreign secretary, gratitude to Weizmann for his munitions discovery combined with personal empathy for him and his Zionist cause culminated in the Balfour Declaration on Nov. 2, 1917, which proclaimed the sympathy of the British government for Zionist aims in Palestine, one of the most important events in the establishment of the Jewish State.

Meanwhile, royalties on his acetone patent gave Weizmann the financial security and independence he needed to allow him to devote himself to Zionism, including presidency of the Zionist movement.

In the 1930s, he went on to create what became the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot, and during World War II, assisted by the warm relationship established years before with Winston Churchill, he brought about the formation of the Jewish Brigade Group in the British army.

And Gooderham? He had returned to the production of whiskey while also pursuing multiple philanthropic interests, including establishing Connaught Laboratories, chairing the Ontario Red Cross, being a prominent member of the board of governors of the University of Toronto and chair of the insulin committee overseeing Banting and Best's discovery.

He was knighted Sir Albert Edward Gooderham, and in 1949, Weizmann was honoured by the state he helped create by being elected the first president of Israel.

Mazuz made wrong call on JNF

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

It could have been her cool blue eyes, but more likely it was those frightening blue numbers tattooed on her forearm.

All I know for sure is that when our Talmud Torah teacher said we all had to save our allowance money and give it to the Jewish National Fund in order to plant trees in Israel, the entire class did just that.

That was some 30 years ago. In the silliness of my childhood and to the chagrin of my good teacher, I dedicated that first tree to my pet bird. Little did I understand then that with this small act, I was now part of a grand plan.

For years, Jewish men would pray while at the same time dropping a few coins into a blue tin box. Women, too, saved pennies from their grocery money and before lighting Shabbat candles would place coins into the JNF tin.

It's been more than 100 years since Theodor Herzl founded the Jewish National Fund. With the JNF, he told us, you don't just have to dream and to aspire, you can actually do something tangible. Give us your coins and we will purchase Palestine, Arab lands, one parcel at a time, and little by little our holdings would grow.

In those days, there was no government, no nation, no people and hence no politics. There were just genuine Jews around the world expressing their Zionism by purchasing land, penny by penny, for other Jews.

Who would have thought then, in those prewar years, that those pennies would one day amount to more than 10 per cent of Israel. Verdant forests, roads systems, vast irrigation projects, land reclamation, desert development – these and more are today's JNF.

Much has happened in just a century, but not everything in the JNF's existence has been rosy. Like the people of Israel, the JNF has weathered financial crises, severe drought and maliciously set fires.

Its latest and current crisis, however, is altogether different.

Israel's attorney general, Menahem Mazuz recently decided that non-Jews could not be barred from buying or leasing JNF lands.

Imagine: land bought by Jews for Jews now being returned to the hands of Arabs.

The clear implication of the attorney general's ruling is that if the JNF continues with its policy to allocate its lands in Israel to Jews alone, it is practising racism.

How unfortunate that Israel's own government would have us fall into that old sewer of "Zionism equals racism."

It wasn't that long ago when "the world" told "us" that, yes in fact, Zionism is racism. One still remembers that single proud moment during that particularly awful debacle when Chaim Herzog, Israel's then-ambassador to the United Nations, defiantly stood before the entire General Assembly and tore up the resolution.

Mazuz's decision has prompted the Knesset to respond, and MKs are now moving forward with new legislation – it's already passed first reading – that would prohibit Israeli Arabs from buying or leasing JNF-owned lands.

One prays that sanity will prevail again soon.

Jewish Life

A true friend of the Jewish people

Churchill and the Jews by Martin Gilbert, McClelland & Stewart

Martin Gilbert, the tireless author of more than 75 books, is Winston Churchill's official biographer and among the foremost historians of the modern world.

In his latest book, he turns to the intriguing subject of Churchill's many-sided relationship with Jews. The British statesman had always been fascinated by Jewish history – above all by the ethics of Judaism and its insistence on monotheism.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1931, Churchill wrote a newspaper article about his admiration for Moses. "He was the greatest of the prophets, who spoke in person to the God of Israel; he was the national hero who led the Chosen People out of the land of bondage, through the perils of the wilderness, and brought them to the very threshold of the Promised Land; he was the supreme law-giver, who received from God that remarkable code upon which the religious, moral and social life of the nation was so securely fastened."

Churchill disdained the notion that the biblical account was a myth. Moses, for him, was the leader of a wandering tribe that was in many ways indistinguishable grasped and proclaimed an idea of which all the genius of Greece and Rome were incapable."

In 1921, Churchill was appointed secretary of state for the colonies with special responsibility for Britain's two League of Nations mandates, Palestine and Iraq.

In a series of intricate political manoeuvres he accepted a plan in which two sons of Sherif Hussein of Mecca would occupy the thrones of Iraq and Transjordan – although Transjordan was an original portion of the Palestine Mandate. In return, western Palestine would remain the Jewish national home under British control.

Confronted with Arab opposition, Churchill declared, "I am myself perfectly convinced that the cause of Zionism is one which carries with it much that is good for the whole world, and not only for the Jewish people, but that it will also bring with it prosperity and contentment and advancement to the Arab population of this country."

Responding to the argument that only a limited number of people could live in a country as small as Palestine, Churchill referred to it as a profound illusion, "There are more people today living 20 storeys living on the ground in New York 100 years ago. There is no limit to the ingenuity of man if it is properly and vigorously applied under conditions of peace and justice."

As colonial secretary, his 1922 White Paper led to the immigration into Palestine of 300,000 Jews in 14 years.

Churchill was a persistent opponent of what he called "the anti-Semitic lines of prejudice," and he strove to support the aspirations of the country's Jews, both as citizens of Britain participating fully in national life and as advocates and participants in the creation of Israel.

In 1946, when Jewish terrorism in Palestine created a backlash of anger in Britain, some members of Parliament became increasingly hostile to Zionism. Churchill countered by contrasting British government policy in Palestine with that of India. The government, he said, "is apparently ready to leave the 40 million Indians to fall into the horrors of sanguinary civil war compared to which anything that could happen in Palestine would be microscopic – wars of elephants compared with wars of mice."

Churchill died in 1965; he was 90 years old. The entire free world mourned. He had once told a colleague, "The Jewish people know well enough that I am their [illegible] Gilbert concludes his book with these words: "This was true, he was both a friend in their hours of need and a friend in deed."

Jewish and Israeli podcasts, Pt. 1

Some of my best friends are no longer around.

But hey, that's OK. I've found new ones to replace them.

A while back, I told you about a number of podcasts that I had become hooked on, such as the one called The View from Here by a couple, olim named Harry and Ziva. From their home in Modiin in central Israel, they would create regular audio reports about life in that country. Harry would fulminate about the latest scandal and then rave about a great Israeli chocolate bar. And I got quite hooked into listening into their discussions and rants.

The Jewish Highway

Well, podcasts come and podcasts go. And it seems that A View from Here is gone.

If you're still among the uninitiated and have never listened to a podcast, think of it as a free radio show that you can download and listen to on your computer or a portable MP3 player such as an iPod. And if you really enjoy a podcast, subscribe to it so that the new editions automatically appear on your computer and on your MP3 player, so that you can listen to them whenever and wherever you want.

There are thousands of podcasts out there and, not surprisingly, quite a few deal with Israel or Judaism. As for the quality of podcasts, they can rival the best documentaries you'll hear anywhere. Or they can sound like they were recorded on a kitchen table (because many are). In this column, I'm going to suggest which podcasts are worth a listen. As to how to listen to them, there are many good sites that will walk you through the process such as at Wikipedia. [en.wikipedia.org/wiki/ Podcast] or Apple's iTunes. [tinyurl. com/ypt4xp]

Luckily, Carol and Charley are still around. They're another American couple who made aliyah and have a lot to say about the state of the State of Israel. To mark their 11th anniversary in the country, they recently devoted a special edition of Israelisms to immigration. In other editions, they voiced their displeasure that haredi schools receive government funding, yet haredim do not serve in the Israeli military. [israelisms.com/]

Sharing a Zionist belief but elsewhere on the political spectrum, Arutz Sheva (also known as Israel National Radio) has created a series of podcasts similar in content, in tone and political outlook to its news service. Other podcasts have suggested that the appointment of Quartet (United Nations, United States, European Union and Russia) special envoy Tony Blair is a waste of time and have visited a group of immigrants from France as they touched down at Ben-Gurion Airport. [tinyurl. com/3dlggy]

OyPod describes itself as "the first and currently only podcast for Jewish teens." Perhaps. What I do know is that this is the lovely work of Danny Zeff, 15, of Sacramento, Calif. "I'm a Conservative Jew who's proud of his heritage. I think ever since I went to Israel, I've definitely gotten a lot more into Jewish culture." Danny looks at his life from a Jewish perspective, such as the time he was asked to sign up for organ donations at his school and wondered what Halachah had to say about organ donations. He did some research and reported on the subject on his site. He's also been known to throw in a Hebrew slang lesson and answer readers' questions, such as "Why are Jews always late?" By the way, Danny thinks his voice in his latest oyPod sounds a bit squeaky. [tinyurl.com/2cndlr]

Oh, one more thing about Ziva and Harry, whom I mentioned earlier. Although their podcast is no longer being produced, I still follow their lives through their blog and can give you an update. Since I last wrote about them, Harry's arthritis is still acting up and can be quite painful. On the other hand, earlier this year, Ziva gave birth to their first child, a daughter, Tzofia, whose picture you can see here. [theviewfromhere.net/]

Even if you don't speak Hebrew, the name Tzofia may ring a bell if you're familiar with the lyrics to Hatikvah, "Ayin L'tzion Tzofiah" ("An eye still watches toward Zion…")

Next time, more podcasts to keep you entertained and informed. Meanwhile, you can do a bit of discovering on your own of the (mostly) Jewish list at tinyurl.com/2eqngh.

New Canadian book explores Berlin Philharmonic during Nazi era

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Misha Aster has done more in his 28 years on this planet than most do in a lifetime.

He's studied at three of the most prestigious schools in the world – McGill University, the London School of Economics, and Harvard University.

The son of an opera director and a university professor, and the grandson of a concert pianist, Aster, born in Hamilton, Ont. and raised in Oakville, Ont., has an ear for music and languages. He speaks five languages and has directed operas in both Canada and Europe – at least one of which he translated from German to English himself.

Now, living in Berlin, Aster is getting set to release his book, Das Reichsorchester: Die Berliner Philharmoniker und der Nationalsozialismus, which translates into The Reichs-Orchestra: National Socialism, at the end of the month in Germany.

Misha Aster

The book chronicles the experience of a community of about 100 musicians during the Third Reich, but focuses mainly on the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra as an institution, and the individual and collective experience of its members, Aster said.

Aster explored the relationship that Wilhelm Furtwängler, the philharmonic's chief conductor, and one of the greatest conductors of the 20th century, had with Nazis before and during World War II.

"Though Furtwängler was never a member of the Nazi Party, he remained in Germany throughout the period. He helped many Jewish musicians and interceded on behalf of a number of persecuted families, but also maintained close ties to the highest leaders of the regime. He remains, therefore, a highly polemical figure, revered by some, condemned by others."

Aster also looked into the fate of the Jewish members of the Berlin Philharmonic.

"Rumours abound about this, and it is widely assumed the orchestra must have suffered a horrible purge in 1933. Astonishingly, the Berlin Philharmonic in 1933 employed only four Jewish musicians. All four Jewish musicians of the Berlin Philharmonic emigrated from Germany between 1934 and 1935. All ended up in the United States."

He added that his research resulted in a history book on a musical subject, not a music history book.

The release of the book on Aug. 25 is meant to coincide with the Berlin Philharmonic's 125th anniversary.

In the philharmonic's 125 years, never has anyone explored its archives and documented its history during the Nazi era. So how did a young Canadian kid end up in Berlin poring over tens of thousands of pages of archival and private collections of correspondence, schedules, programs, lists, memos, and photographs to produce the first book on the subject?

"I have had a love affair with the city since a family visit to Berlin in winter, 1990… After 1995, I went off to university and then began working, but Berlin remained a pole to which I would gravitate whenever time allowed."

Always looking for an excuse to settle in Berlin, Aster finally found it when he found himself on a train from Berlin to Basel, and "through a series of remarkable coincidences," met and had breakfast with a man named Walter Küssner, archivist in the Berl[illegible]

"At some point in our conversation, the subject of the experience of the orchestra during the Third Reich came up. Walter is of the German generation of the 1960s, for whom the Nazi era is a vivid presence, but not personal memory. He expressed his dismay at the lack of information about the Berlin Philharmonic both before and during the war years. He described the period as a blank spot in the orchestra's history," Aster recalled.

Aster and Küssner had already developed a friendship when Küssner was appointed Berlin Philharmonic Archivist in 2002.

"The moment he took the job, he called me up and said, 'Now is our chance.' He asked me to come to Berlin and undertake some preliminary investigating, just to see what could be dug up on the mysterious blank spot."

Five years later, Aster is anticipating the release of the book, the only one on the subject to date.

"To the question, why is a 28 year old kid from Canada writing this book rather than some distinguished German intellectual, the answer is simple: because in over half a century, no one else has. In the past week I have had two Germans say to me, 'I am going to buy this book for my mother.' I think the Berlin Philharmonic recognizes this is something long overdue, and are pleased someone has taken the initiative to look into it."

The Canadian edition of the book will be published by Mosaic Press and is due out in Spring 2008.

Correction

The article "Members vote to reorient Holy Blossom sanctuary" (CJN, Aug. 2), about a membership vote at Holy Blossom Temple regarding renovations and a possible reorientation of the sanctuary to face east, contained a misleading statistic and an incorrect number of total voters. In fact, 61 per cent of members who voted to renovate – not 61 per cent of all 2,594 voters – were in favour of reorienting the sanctuary to face east. Only 58 percent of all voters – a total that includes those who voted against renovations of any kind – were in favour of the change.

Reports highlight growing security threats

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Supporters of Israel often complain that foreign correspondents ignore the genuine security threats facing the tiny Jewish state.

That complaint was valid in the spring and summer of 2002, when Israeli forces tried to eliminate terrorist cells in the Palestinian territories under "Operation Defensive Shield." At the time, the Israeli army was frequently depicted as an aggressor operating with "excessive force." Numerous media outlets painted a similar portrait of Israel's military during last summer's conflict with Hezbollah.

But now another story is starting to gain some ground. Many journalists have seen how Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in August 2005 has been met by persistent Qassam rocket fire into Israel's southern communities, especially the town of Sderot. They have also seen how Iran fuels and funds, with Syria's assistance, Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in Gaza.

In "Waiting at the border: Israel girds for attack" (Toronto Star, Aug. 4), Oakland Ross described Israeli concerns about the Iranian-Syrian re-supply of Hezbollah. Interviewing Israel Defence Forces soldiers and commanders at Israel's northern border with Lebanon, Ross wrote: "The Israel Defence Forces believe Hezbollah has spent the past year replenishing its stockpiles of rockets, including the short-range Katyushas that turned this side of the border into a free-fire zone last summer."

Ross quoted Col. Kobi Marom, former commander of the front with Lebanon, who said about Hezbollah: "They don't want to escalate the situation today… They need time to recover. But it's just a question of time until they try again."

Ross noted that the 13,000-strong United Nations force has been effective – even according to the IDF – in keeping Hezbollah from re-establishing itself militarily, though Hezbollah flags still fly and its members frequently test the security of Israel's electronically monitored border fence.

Aftermath of a Qassam rocket attack on a Sderot school.

Meanwhile, according to the Globe and Mail's Mark MacKinnon in "Kremlin sets sights on Middle East" (Aug. 7), Russia may be planning to re-establish its naval base at the Syrian port of Tartus, an act that will surely embolden Syria's support for Hezbollah in Lebanon.

MacKinnon wrote that, if true, the move "would mark the first time Russia has established a military presence outside the borders of the former Soviet Union since the USSR fell apart in 1991."

The implications for Israel and the region are enormous. Not only would Russia challenge the U.S. presence and policy in the Middle East, it would dramatically complicate Israel's latitude to act against Syria in a conflict over the Golan Heights, or against renewed aggression from Hezbollah in Lebanon.

MacKinnon noted: "Two years ago, Moscow wrote off nearly $10 billion [US] Soviet-era debt owed to it by Syria. Now it's reportedly in the midst of selling medium-range missiles and MIG-31 fighter planes to Damascus over Israel's objections."

Russia also maintains lucrative arms deals with Iran, including support for Tehran's nuclear ambitions. And it provides diplomatic support to Hamas, which is backed by both Iran and Syria. Hamas' Damascus-based leader, Khaled Meshaal, was recently invited by Russian President Vladimir Putin to visit Moscow for a second time.

With the United States badly tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan, and with Iran and Syria pushing their aggressive interests, fuelled by growing Russian support, and with Hezbollah trying to assert itself against the shaky Lebanese government led by Fouad Siniora, the Middle East is fragile and volatile.

And all this is occurring while Israel and the Fatah-led Palestinian Authority are trying to revive a peace process based on major Israeli territorial compromise in return for Palestinian security guarantees – precisely what Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas, and, arguably, Syria at this moment, will try their best to thwart.

Former actuarial student takes a risk

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although it's been years since he was in school to become an actuary – somone who calculates financial risk and uncertainty – as the co-owner of The Israeli Source, financial risk and uncertainty is still very much a part of his life.

Chuck Elnekave and his wife of four years, Barbara, opened Israeli Source: the Ultimate Jewish Shopping Experience gift store in Thornhill, Ont., about 1½ years ago, but despite the challenges that come with starting a new business, Elnekave said he couldn't be happier.

Just a few years ago, the 28-year-old, who grew up in Thornhill, was studying mathematics at York University.

"I saw myself being an actuary at one point, but I really started to like working in the Jewish market. I went to university with a real love for math and by the time I came out, I decided that I like practical stuff, and I don't like to focus on all this theoretical stuff," he said.

He said he had a positive experience working at Israel's Judaica and he also gained experience working with his stepfather, who does wholesale and retail of food products primarily from Israel.

"His business approach combined with the product knowledge that I have from Israel's is what I tried to put together here," Elnekave said, referring to Israeli Source, his Judaica store at 60 Doncaster Ave., through which he sells Jewish products that he buys in bulk, so he can sell his merchandise at a more affordable cost.

Chuck and Barbara Elnekave

"We are more of a volume retailer. We don't necessarily carry as expensive a selection. We carry fewer different products, but we buy more of them. And we try to buy at a cheaper price so we can pass the savings on to the customer," Elnekave said, adding that while they do carry products from North America, they try to carry as much merchandise from Israel as they can.

But he said that his experience with the business end of the Judaica world, combined with his wife's product knowledge, is the secret to their success.

"Although Barbara, my wife, spends a considerable amount of time at home with our daughter, she is an integral part of running this operation, and wears herself thin just trying to put in enough time here at work as well," he said.

"Her knowledge of judaica is probably even superior to mine, which makes us the perfect team – I bring in the family experience in terms of importing and wholesale, and she brings the product knowledge."

Elnekave said he loves the challenges associated with running a business, but most of all, his biggest joy is exposing people to products that can change their outlook.

He recalled an incident involving a customer from Barrie, Ont., who visited his store a day before Rosh Hashanah last year. At the time, there was a promotion, during which a percentage of every sale was donated to the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, a non-profit organization in Canada that supports Israeli soldiers on active duty.

"He wasn't really connected at all to Judaism, but he felt a strong connection to Israel and he was feeling like maybe he should try to find a shul for the High Holidays, so when he saw the ad that said that a percentage of his purchase would go to benefit the soldiers, he decided to come in and pick up a machzor," Elnekave said.

The customer soon began making regular visits, each time asking more questions about products such as tzitzit, mezuzot and books on Halachah.

"Eventually he wanted to start learning Talmud to try to understand it all. He's now in Israel for the summer, and he mentioned last month that he's strongly considering moving to Toronto to be closer to the religious neighbourhoods, or possibly even trying to go to Israel for a year or more and spend time in a hesder yeshivah [a program that combines Torah study with service in the Israeli army]," Elnekave said.

"I thought this was a really nice twist on how we started out trying to bring Israel to our customers, and while we've accomplished that, we've also managed to bring our customers to Israel."

Elnekave also said he enjoys the fact that one product, such as a kiddish cup, can fulfil the needs of every kind of Jew, regardless if someone is looking for a functional, run-of-the-mill piece, or an artistic masterpiece.

"To see which customers have an affinity for a certain type of product, you might think the modern, liberal Jews might like the more artistic stuff and the traditional Jews might like the more traditional stuff, but it's not always the case. You get a lot of the liberal Jews who just want something that's nostalgic, something that is like what their bubbie used to have," he said.

"The biggest joy is helping people find what they want… This feels like something I was meant to be doing."

Obituary

Artist helped Holocaust survivors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Evelyn Zacks, a tireless worker for Holocaust survivors and a noted artist, died July 18. She was 97.

She and her husband, Archie, the Canadian representative of Vaad Hatzalah, an organization started by the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, worked with Vaad Hatzalah to assist European Jews who came to Canada during and after the war. She helped establish temporary housing at the Hashomer Hadati (later Mizrachi) camp in Bronte, Ont.

Evelyn would cook for the people at the camp – which, among its other residents, housed roshei yeshiva of the famed Mir Yeshiva who had found safety in Shanghai – and she had her husband drive the food out to Bronte. She also provided doctors and medicines for the camp residents, and helped them get visas and whatever help they needed.

Her son, Ralph, said many people came to the funeral and shiva, telling stories of all the help she gave to them in their time of great need. One woman said Evelyn once travelled on foot in a blinding snowstorm to help her get visas.

Before the Hungarian Revolution in 1956, she and her husband helped Jews still living there escape to safety.

Evelyn Zacks, then Evelyn Frisch, came to Canada from Sassov, Poland, in 1929. Although times were hard, her mother insisted that she go to school.

Ralph Zacks said that his mother worked hard, and, in an effort to integrate fully in her new country, managed to lose her accent.

Ever since she was a child in Poland, Zacks said, his mother loved doing tapestry work and petit point. She took her work to the Canadian National Exhibition, where several "socialites," as Zacks described them, commissioned her to decorate their purses.

From this modest start, she was asked by the government to teach crafts, especially tapestry and petit point, in small communities around Ontario.

Always an observant Jew, she took kosher food with her on her trips, and she insisted on being home for Shabbat and Yom Tov.

She also worked at the Art Institute of Ontario, where she met artist Frank Carmichael, a member of the famed Group of Seven.

"She got Frank Carmichael to change his art, to use different colouring, and a different way to separate the sky and earth," Zacks said of his mother.

Tapestry and petit point were not her only artistic talents. She painted, sculpted and did bronzes, and she also taught all these skills.

When she got older, she volunteered at Baycrest, where she also taught arts and crafts, and came up with projects and programs to get the residents to "refocus" their minds, her son said.

At the same time, she took courses at the University of Toronto's Innis College until she was 93.

Evelyn Zacks is survived by her brother Irving, her son Ralph and his wife Daphna, and grandchildren Aaron, Shoshana, Meira, Hadassah and Deena. She was predeceased by her husband Archie, and brothers Shia, Sidney, Sam, Harry, Bill, and Itche.

What do all these labels mean anyway?

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. With so many natural and organic foods now in the grocery store, I am increasingly confused about what labels mean – natural, free range, no hormones, organic, etc.. Can you please explain?

A. You are right. There are many new and confusing terms on foods these days. Here is the way the Canadian Food Inspection Agency defines some of them:

There are no actual criteria for the words "free range," and the term does not mean organic unless otherwise specified. The package will often explain what the company means by free range, but it's not a regulated term.

Raised without the use of hormones, means that no hormones were administered to the animal when it was raised. Hormones naturally exist in animals, but this claim is irrelevant and misleading when pertaining to poultry or eggs because these foods are not allowed to be treated with hormones. The description is applicable only for beef and dairy products.

Raised without the use of antibiotics simply means that this animal was not treated with antibiotics during raising.

For beef, poultry, dairy products, etc., organic means that the animals were fed only organic feed, never received hormones or antibiotics or other prohibited drugs and were never irradiated. Organic pertaining to fruits and vegetables means that they were grown without any synthetic fertilizers or pesticides, and have not been genetically engineered or irradiated. There is currently no regulation of organic fish in Canada.

It is good to know, too, that the regulation and inspection of these foods and control of these claims is getting better every year. The Canadian Food Inspection Agency's new Canada Organic Regime is due to go into effect by 2008.

Q. I heard something recently about a new government hotline that helps educate the public on nutrition. Where can I find this?

A. The Ontario government recently launched a major initiative offering a free information line to residents manned exclusively by registered dietitians who can offer advice and answer questions. The toll-free number is 1-877-510-5102, and it is available Monday to Friday, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. eastern time; or go to www.Ontario.ca\EatRight.

Q. I love the iced coffee drinks offered in many of the specialty coffee stores. Are they loaded with calories?

A. These beverages have become very popular and are delicious, but many are high in fat and calories. The good news is that almost every place I see offering them also has the nutrition information available if you ask for it, so that you can make an educated decision when ordering.

My advice – get an ice coffee, ask for the lowest fat milk they have and then add your own sugar sparingly or a shot of no-cal sweetener. Avoid the giant size drinks, leave off the whipped cream and the whole milk, and control the added sugar. Then you can still cool off with a delicious drink, get your caffeine jolt and end up with under 200 calories and one gram of fat. The full deal is usually 500 to 600 calories and close to 20 grams of fat, most of which is saturated.

Q. I suffer from arthritis. Are there any foods that can help with this?

A. One super food when it comes to inflammation from arthritis and gout is sour cherries. These are typically not sold fresh, but rather as frozen berries, dried, or more commonly as juice. One cup of sour cherry juice per day can have great benefits in easing some of the pain associated with this inflammatory disease. The juice doesn't taste tart. It is actually incredibly fresh and delicious tasting, like the inside of a cherry pie, and is available at health and specialty stores.

Ve'ahavta helps Ottawa street outreach program

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Toronto's Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee has extended its reach to help Jewish Family Services of Ottawa's StreetSmarts program bring aid to the local homeless population.

Two vehicles bearing donated supplies recently arrived in Ottawa to boost the stores of goods for distribution by StreetSmarts volunteers.

The connection between the two groups was made by former Ottawan Naomi Levitz, who now lives in Toronto.

While working as a summer student with Jewish Family Services (JFS) in 2004, Levitz connected with Pete Cassidy, senior outreach worker with the StreetSmarts program, and became involved in the project.

After the summer, she attended the University of Michigan, where she completed an MSW, and then moved to Toronto, where she works as a mobile mental health issues crisis team worker. She became involved with Ve'ahavta and has participated in its projects in El Salvador, Cuba and Toronto.

"Throughout my work with homeless women in Michigan and with the Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless [MJRH] in Toronto, Pete and the StreetSmarts program have remained on my mind," Levitz said.

"Recently, Ve'ahavta has renewed its goal of fulfilling its mandate as a 'Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.' The MJRH is now approaching its 10th year, and facilitates connections between volunteers and the street community to lend a listening ear and necessary supplies. It's a wonderful program, involving hundreds of community members here to solicit products, to make sandwiches, to give out supplies, to lend an ear," she added.

"The StreetSmarts program, while smaller in scale, shares the same commitment to non-judgmental listening and strives to 'love thy neighbour as thyself.' Through Pete and an outreach team, members of Ottawa's street community feel listened to and validated. Through socks or a toothbrush, self-esteem and renewed hope can be found," Levitz said.

"This past year, Ve'ahavta hosted Pete and showed him around Toronto homeless services. It was the beginning of a fruitful relationship that has resulted in four van loads totalling over $6,000 worth of in-kind donations being brought to Ottawa."

Sarah Caspi, JFS' co-ordinator of StreetSmarts, was enthusiastic about the connection.

"Pete Cassidy's trip to Toronto last winter was very inspiring and left Pete very excited and full of ideas. Ve'ahavta has been very generous to StreetSmarts, having made two other trips to donate to the StreetSmarts program prior to this trip. We're a small group with limited funds, so it's a huge boost to the program to have donations of this calibre," Caspi said.

"Although Ve'ahavta operates a much bigger program than StreetSmarts, collaborating in many street outreach programs, there is a common thread that binds them together: both are working in the spirit of tikkun olam."

She added: "Although both groups have many non-Jewish individuals working for them, Jewish ideals – from polices of inclusiveness… to our pursuing the education and the establishment of outreach to the Jewish community around issues of homelessness – are present in all that is done."

Brandeis program trains day school teachers

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Kathy Kanigsberg of Ottawa was one of seven women who recently graduated from a unique teacher-training program at Brandeis University.

The program, called DeLeT – short for Day School Leadership Through Teaching and also the Hebrew word for "door" – is the only program in North America focused solely on preparing Jewish day school teachers with a year-long mentored internship.

"Over the past five years, DeLeT graduates have become inspired educators and active teacher-leaders in their day school communities, making an impact on the field of day school education that is disproportionate to their numbers," said Judy Elkin, DeLeT director and Mandel Center senior Jewish educator.

Kanigsberg, who attended Ottawa's Hillel Academy, went on to a five-year B.Ed. program at McGill University. She then spent two years working in a pre-school at Montreal's West Island JCC.

"I loved it, but I knew that I wanted a bit more of a challenge. I found this program [DeLeT] and it had a lot of what I wanted… a big plus for me was that it was a year-long internship so I was in the same place for the whole year, which is very rare to find," she said.

"Also, it taught how to teach both general studies and Hebrew studies and how to integrate them. I think kids can leave school a bit confused, but with this model we are fusing the two together. It is a really important message we are sending that the Jewish part is just as important as the general part," she added

"I started the program last July and by the end of July, I knew that it was going to be a life-changing experience."

Kanigsberg had high praise for both the program and the mentor teachers.

"Without them, I would not be half the teacher I am today. Today I count them as my friends and as my colleagues. They are not just my teachers."

Now set to put her lessons into practice, Kanigsberg will be remaining at the school where she did her internship.

"I got my dream job," she said.

She will soon start teaching kindergarten at the South Area Solomon Schechter Day School and will also be continuing her studies in order to complete her master's in teaching at Brandeis by next summer.

"I think that will keep me busy," she said.

Kanigsberg's enthusiasm for the DeLeT program is so infectious that this year's class includes her sister Sarah, who will be working in a Grade 1 class in September.

For details on the DeLeT program, visit www.brandeis.edu/centers/mandel/DeLeT.

Quebec to fund renovations at Jewish nursing home

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish Eldercare Centre (JEC) will receive more than $1,5 million from the Quebec government for renovations.

Mont Royal MNA Pierre Arcand announced at a press conference at the long-term-care institution that the health and social services ministry will underwrite the cost of renovating many of the washrooms, replacing the nurse-calling system and installing rail-mounted patient lifts in the David and Sylvia Kastner Pavilion.

The money is coming from a fund established in 2005 to expand or improve the province's institutions for the elderly. A total of $725 million is to be spent over a five-year period, Arcand said.

JEC president Mark Potechin said the first project will be to upgrade the security features of the washrooms, benefiting both patients and staff. Bathing areas will also be redesigned to allow greater privacy for patients.

Potechin said the baths and showers have become rundown and the plumbing needs changing.

The second project will be to install a new system that will enable patients to call staff more easily and allow staff to communicate among themselves more efficiently and respond more quickly to emergencies.

The third phase of the renovation will be the installation of a new type of lift in all patient rooms, which will be safer for both patients and staff.

Work is expected to begin in the fall.

Potechin said the grant will "go a long way towards improving the quality of life of our residents by enhancing their physical environment and enabling our outstanding team of professionals to provide even better care… We are pleased with this investment and the confidence that the government is showing in the services that we offer."

The Kastner pavilion is one of the two main buildings of the 320-bed JEC, which was formed by a merger of the Jewish Hospital of Hope and the Jewish Nursing Home in 2001.

"Here at the JEC we provide comprehensive and compassionate care to the elderly affected by chronic illness or by the loss of physical or cognitive autonomy. We do so in a homelike environment and according to Jewish tradition and values," Potechin said.

Arcand also announced that another institution in his riding, the Centre d'hébergement Vigi de Mont-Royal, will receive $1.65 million to upgrade its facilities. In addition, he referred to the government's intention to set up a public consultation process this fall to address the question of how to better meet the needs of an aging population.

Rural shuls thrive amid cottage country boom

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to the CJN

Is there a better way to relish those gloriously hot summer days then spending them at the cottage?

For an ever-growing number of Toronto-area Jews, cottage country is a haven.

Its serenity, beautiful scenery, amenities, fresh water lakes and reprieve from big-city hustle bustle draw thousands every year.

And as the Jewish population in cottage country climbs in the summer months, the demand for synagogue services expands.

As a result, areas such as Lake Simcoe, Muskoka, Wasaga Beach and Jackson's Point have decent turnouts for Shabbat services during cottage season.

"It's quite well attended," says Gershon Weinstock, who attends and is secretary of the Hebrew Centre of Belle Ewart, located in between Bradford and Barrie.

"And we're getting bigger and bigger."

Built in 1944, the Belle Ewart congregation is Orthodox and offers weekday as well as weekend services.

The shul has a mikvah, which Weinstock says contributes to the significant participation of women, and also provides Judaica classes.

While it may take two or three hours to get to some cottages, Belle Ewart is about an hour from the city, and Weinstock believes that proximity is a factor in the shul's vitality.

In Jackson's Point, the Hebrew Community Centre Synagogue caters to between 50 and 75 people on Shabbat during cottage season.

"People like the warmth of the shul, the camaraderie," explains Michael Harari, who has been attending services there for about 15 years.

"We have definitely grown in the last five years as cottage country has become more popular in general."

Like the Belle Ewart congregation, the Jackson's Point shul is Orthodox, but it doesn't have a rabbi or chazzan, so services are run communally.

However, Rabbi Yaacov Felder provides spiritual guidance to congregants, Harari says.

In 2003, the synagogue underwent a much-needed facelift.

The synagogue had been in disrepair and was far from modern. To the rescue came Mendel Green and Julie Wise, area cottagers who helped generate $75,000 for renovations, which gave a fresh new look and feel to the ark, kitchen, lighting, washrooms and many other areas of the synagogue.

"It's not a big shul, but it's very heimish," notes Harari.

"It's a very nice place for people [in cottage] country to go on Shabbos."

Other cottage shuls include the Orillia Cottage Shul, the Tent City Area Shul, the Wasaga Beach Community Shul and the B'nai Isaac Synagogue just outside of Baysville in Muskoka.

"It's a very homey shul," says physician and mohel Aaron Jessin of the B'nai Isaac.

"My grandfather bought the property about 30 years ago and today, we have as many as 50 people [attending services]."

Bangladeshi journalist is a proud 'Muslim Zionist'

Choudhury is almost serene in that knowledge and acceptance. His wife, Happy, and two children, daughter Priyanka, 17, and son Hamzalah, 7, he said, support him completely. So, he added, do thousands of fellow Bangladeshis who share his pluralistic sensibilities and are fighting with him for the forces enlightenment to prevail over the tide of radical Islam in his country that is rising despite its origins as a secular parliamentary democracy.

"There's a large, large number of Bangladeshi people who feel the same as we do," Choudhury said, "and many of them – or at least some of them – have openly expressed their support for me," in particular the Bangladesh Minority Lawyers Association, which is representing him in court.

On the other hand, most top-ranked lawyers in Bangladesh won't touch his case, "because they think if they support a Muslim Zionist, it will hamper their careers," he noted. "They don't like to support me, but I don't care."

On the eve of returning to his country, Choudhury was buoyed by his six-day trip to New York, New Jersey and Washington, where he addressed synagogue, audiences, visited Capitol Hill, and lunched with the American Jewish Committee, which last year presented Choudhury, at the time in absentia, with its Moral Courage Award.

He also received some excellent news during the trip. Despite Choudhury's own belief that a diagnosed case of glaucoma was causing impairment of sight in his right eye, a New York doctor told him that he has never had the disease, just the effects of a bad eye infection that was never properly treated and made worse by sleeping on a jail floor under poor conditions.

Throughout the trip, Choudhury was accompanied by Richard Benkin, a Jewish activist who was able to help Choudhury get out of prison on bail in 2005. The two invariably address each other as "my brother" and launched a website together – interfaithstrength.com – to promote understanding among religions.

Still, they don't necessarily agree on everything. Despite his generally optimistic outlook, Choudhury thinks there is only a 50-50 chance that charges against him will be dropped, and it won't be accomplished so easily, because of the necessity to "appease radical forces."

Benkin told The CJN that while the fact that Choudhury was allowed out of his country might be taken as a positive sign, "it's not good policy to wait and hope that things go well."

Benkin believes the current interim Bangladeshi government "has to see that if the case is not resolved, there could be some real, serious consequences," particularly with regard to trade benefits.

"There are many possible routes by which these charges can be dropped," Benkin said, but he quoted Cotler to the effect that you cannot expect Bangladesh to do the "logical" or "right" thing.

Choudhury has on occasion identified with the notion that he is living out the pages of a Franz Kafka novel. Benkin sometimes calls him "Joseph K," the protagonist in Kafka's masterpiece, The Trial.

Then there's what Choudhury considers the completely laughable notion that he has been a Mossad spy – "I mean, it's too funny!" – or that he is "blasphemous" in his acceptance of other religions.

Choudhury said he inherited his tolerant, open nature from his father, who received a master's degree in India and instilled in his family the principle "never to hate any particular religion."

Choudhury first met Jews when he was starting out as a journalist, "and they were many of my colleagues. They were wonderful."

It is incomprehensible to him why his country has not yet recognized Israel, a nation that was among the first to recognize Bangladeshi independence in 1971. Choudhury has referred to himself proudly as a "Muslim Zionist" and said that "as a Bangladeshi, I feel personally obligated towards Israel."

Choudhury is grateful for the support he has received from the West, most notably in the form of strong resolutions by the U.S. Congress and the European Union. He is also grateful for Cotler's efforts and for representations made by the Canadian government on his behalf and by other canadians, including a letter in May sent by the Canadian Journalists for Free Expression to Bangladesh's high commissioner in Ottawa.

Whatever support he may have, however, Choudhury is facing a real threat if charges against him are not dropped. Yet, as Benkin said, Choudhury "would not entertain any notion of not going back," despite several offers of political asylum.

"He would never even consider it," Benkin said.

אדמות מדינה-מבחן לדמוקרטיה

חמש עשרה שנה ל-TAILS

בשביעי לאוקטובר (יום ראשון) תוצג "זנבות" ב-10:30 בבוקר במועדון הג'ז Rex שבדאון טאון, ובחנוכה תוצג ההצגה פעמיים ביום ראשון ה- 9 בדצמבר ב- JCC של בְּלור וספדיינה באולם מיילס נאדאל. סמנו לכם את הימים האלה, ופרטים יבואו בהמשך.

סרטים שכדאי לראות הקיץ

Ratatouille הוא סרט מצוייר על חולד שרוצה להפוך לשף במסעדה פריזאית. לא לא לא ! אל תטעו! זה לא סרט ילדים, זהו סרט מהנה ונוגע ללב, שגם ילדים ייהנו ממנו, אבל בעיקר אתם. עשר בסולם קורן.

Paris je t'aime הוא נסיון קולנועי מיוחד: נתנו למיטב הבמאים לעשות כל אחד סרטון בן חמש דקות שמוקדש לאחד משמונה עשר הרובעים של פאריז. התוצאה מדהימה. לא יאומן מה אנשים מוכשרים יכולים לעשות עם חמש דקות סיפור!! עוד עשר בסולם קורן.

Hairspray הוא סרט לפי המחזמר ההוליבודי על תחנת טלביזיה לבני נוער בבולטימור של שנות הששים. אנרגיה נהדרת ושירים מקסימים. שווה ללכת רק כדי לראות את ג'ון טרוולטה שמופיע בתפקיד של אמא. תצאו עם חיוך גדול. תשע בסולם קורן.

נגני הג'ז של סיד

Camp Kadimah kids support Israeli counterparts

By JOEL JACOBSON

Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — Teens at Camp Kadimah in Barss Corner, N.S., raised $5,005 for the Koby Mandell Foundation and Camp Koby on Kibbutz Negba, near Ashkelon, Israel.

The camp was founded by Koby's parents, Americans Rabbi Seth Mandell and his wife Sherri, an author and journalist, who emigrated to Israel in 1996. The camp, for kids who have lost a parent or sibling to terror, is a memorial to their son, who was killed by Palestinians in the West Bank in 2001.

It enables young people to enjoy camping programs such as art; music and drama therapy; swimming, basketball, soccer and other sports; and tours and special entertainment.

The 14- and 15-year-olds from Camp Kadimah [illegible]

"It really has been an amazing experience watching these kids put so much effort into something that in the end means so much to so many people," said Adam Armeland, Kadima's assistant group leader for 14- and 15-year-olds.

"It was especially meaningful to the kids because they felt a connection helping kids of their age have similar experiences."

Baking up some sweet memories

By NORENE GILLETZ

Here are some super sweets to prepare the next time you have company. They're decadent and definitely not low in calories, so these recipes are best saved for special occasions!

The first recipe comes from cookbook author and caterer Susan Mendelson of Vancouver. Her recipes have been favourites in kitchens around the globe for nearly 30 years. I often receive requests on how to make Molten Lava Cakes, so this recipe will be a luscious addition to your culinary repertoire. The recipe was given to Mendelson by Hawaiian friends who promised that it would be a memorable dessert. I'm sure you'll agree!

LAZY GOURMET'S LAVA CAKES

Source: Mama Now Cooks Like This by Susan Mendelson, Whitecap

¼ cup butter
½ lb. semi-sweet chocolate
½ cup sugar
3 tbsp. cornstarch
4 whole eggs
4 egg yolks

Melt butter and chocolate in a saucepan over low heat.

Mix sugar and cornstarch together in a bowl. Crack eggs into another bowl and whisk yolks into whole eggs.

When chocolate has melted, remove from heat. Whisk in sugar-cornstarch mixture until blended. Add eggs and stir until smooth. Chill in the fridge overnight.

Preheat the oven to 400. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

Line 8 metal rings (you can use 1½-inch deep tin cans with both ends opened) with a strip of parchment paper, or grease ½-cup ramekins. Set the rings on the baking sheet and brush generously with butter. Scoop chocolate filling into each one, filling them two-thirds full.

Bake in preheated oven for 12 to 15 minutes. Remove from oven. Slice a metal spatula under cakes and transfer to serving plates. Gently slide the rings off cakes and remove the parchment. Dust with icing sugar and serve immediately. Makes 8 servings.

These squares are quick to make when I don't have much time to spend in the kitchen. I can mix them up in about 2 minutes in my food processor, so they're ideal when you are asked to bring a delicious dessert for a pot luck event. I often bake them in advance and freeze them. When I did catering in Montreal, these were a staple in my repertoire. They're very rich and luscious, so cut them in small squares.

NORENE'S LEMON SQUARES

Source: The Food Processor Bible by Norene Gilletz, Whitecap

Base
1 cup butter or margarine, cut in chunks
2 cups flour
½ cup sugar
Topping
4 eggs
¼ to ⅓ cup lemon juice (preferably fresh, but bottled is also fine)
2 cups sugar
¼ cup flour
1 tsp. baking powder

Preheat oven to 350. For base: Process base ingredients on the steel blade of a food processor until crumbly, about 20 seconds. Press into sprayed 9 x 13-inch baking pan. Bake for 18 to 20 minutes, until golden.

Process topping ingredients until blended, about 10 seconds. Pour over base. Bake 25 to 30 minutes longer, until golden. Cut into squares when cool. Makes about 48 squares. Freezes well.

The recipe for these addictive cookies comes from my "pan-pal" Cori Freedman. A few months ago, I was visiting my daughter and her family in Richmond, BC. We were having dinner in a Chinese restaurant with a mutual friend. Freedman, her daughter and her grandchildren stopped by our table to chat for a few minutes. After the meal, they stopped by once again and Cori reached into her purse and gave each of us one of these yummy cookies from her "Bubbie-Bag."

Freedman told me "These are the cookies that my grandchildren adore, so I always bring them along with me to give to them as a special treat when we go out for dinner together." I asked her to share the recipe with me and received the following e-mail from her:

"I am sorry that it took some time to e-mail this to you. My daughter Alexis has been nagging me to send it to you. The recipe came from a magazine advertisement and I've adapted it to make in my food processor. I hope your family (and your readers) enjoy these cookies as much as mine does!"

CORI'S TOFFEE CHOCOLATE ALMOND CRUNCHIES

1 cup butter, softened
¾ cup packed brown sugar
½ cup granulated sugar
1 egg
1¾ cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
2 tsp. vanilla
1 cup quick-cooking oats
1 pkg. (200g) Skor toffee bits
1 cup chocolate chips (milk or dark chocolate)
¼ cup slivered almonds
½ cup dried cranberries, if desired

Preheat oven to 375. Line baking sheets with parchment paper.

In a food processor, process butter, brown sugar, granulated sugar and egg together until smooth. Add the flour, baking powder and salt and process until blended. Blend in vanilla. Remove mixture from the processor bowl and transfer it to a large mixing bowl. Stir in the oats, toffee bits, chocolate chips, almonds (and dried cranberries, if using), until well combined. Drop dough by tablespoonfuls onto prepared baking sheets.

Bake on the middle rack of the oven at 375 for 8 to 12 minutes, or until light golden. Cool for 5 minutes on sheet, then transfer to rack and cool completely. Makes about 4 dozen. Freezes well.

Boycott of Hamas counterproductive, Brown told

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Britain's refusal to speak to Hamas is counterproductive, and efforts should be made to form a new Palestinian unity government in the West Bank and Gaza, a British parliamentary committee recommended Monday.

A report published by the House of Commons' foreign affairs committee concluded that pursuing a "West Bank first policy" – under which Britain deals with the West Bank, which is run by the Fatah party, and isolates the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip – would further jeopardize peace.

"Given the failure of the boycott [of Hamas] to deliver results, we recommend the government should urgently consider ways of engaging politically with moderate elements within Hamas," the all-party committee said.

It said Britain's former prime minister Tony Blair should personally engage with Hamas to help bring about reconciliation with the rival Fatah movement, in his new role as envoy for the Quartet of Middle East mediators – the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia.

Britain has joined in a western political and financial embargo imposed on Hamas, an Islamist movement with an armed wing that is regarded as a terrorist group by Israel, the European Union and the United States.

Hamas has been isolated because of its refusal to meet three criteria laid down by the Quartet – recognition of Israel's right to exist, renunciation of violence and adherence to interim peace agreements with Israel.

The parliamentary report also recommended that Britain push Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, whose Fatah group is backed by the West, into negotiations with Hamas to re-establish "a national unity government across the occupied Palestinian territories."

The committee said Britain had erred in enforcing the embargo against Hamas, even after the group agreed in February to form a unity government with Fatah. That agreement was aimed at ending internal violence and easing western economic sanctions.

The sustained boycott of the Palestinian government because Hamas was part of it meant the effort at unity had been "highly likely to collapse," the report said.

Factional fighting between the rival movements eventually led to Hamas taking control of the Gaza Strip in June, while Fatah, which lost elections to Hamas in early 2006, was reduced to administering the larger West Bank territory.

The committee also called for a new approach to ending the Arab-Israeli conflict. It reaffirmed the goal of a two-state solution but said the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, drawn up in 2002, "has largely become an irrelevance."

Neither the Israelis nor the Palestinians have fulfilled their commitments under the plan, which calls for Israel to halt settlement building in the West Bank and the Palestinians to dismantle militant groups and cease terror attacks.

The report advised Prime Minister Gordon Brown's government to improve its image in the Arab world because, it said, Britain's reputation has been damaged by its policies in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority.

In Israel, speaking on the same issue, Meretz party chair Yossi Beilin said last week it is vital that Israel reach an agreement with Hamas, directly or indirectly, before the Middle East summit scheduled for this fall. Otherwise, he said, Gaza may "explode."

Beilin, speaking at a Jerusalem conference held by the Geneva Initiative and the Konrad Adenauer Stiftung on the Geneva Convention, said a ceasefire negotiated with Hamas would include it taking responsibility for a total cessation of Qassam fire.

"Hamas have said they are capable of stopping Qassam fire on Israel, and I believe they can," he said.

Interfaith effort in a Polish town

By DINAH A. SPITZER
JTA

Michael Schudrich, left, the chief rabbi of Poland, and Czestochowa Mayor Tadeusz Wrona clean up a gravestone on Aug. 7 in the town's Jewish cemetery, which was badly desecrated.

PRAGUE — Local Polish officials and Catholic teens wasted little time in joining the small Jewish community to clean up one of the biggest cemetery desecrations in postwar Polish history.

One Sunday, police discovered that some 100 graves in the Jewish cemetery of Czestochowa were covered with anti-Semitic graffiti. The next Tuesday, the cleanup began in the southern Polish town.

"We are here together in order to say that we are taken aback with what happened and we want to quickly as possible get rid of these horrible symbols," Czestochowa Mayor Tadeusz Wrona told JTA, speaking by phone from the cemetery.

Swastikas, skinhead symbols and a Magen David in a noose, as well as the phrase "Juden Raus," or "Jews Out," were among the graffiti spray-painted by unknown perpetrators.

Polish President Lech Kaczynski decried the desecration in a letter to the head of the town's Jewish organization.

"This act of aggression is unusually shocking, especially because the Czestochowa graveyard belongs to one of the most impressive Jewish cemeteries in Poland," Kaczynski wrote. It is an act of aggression "against the heritage of Czestochowa, against the common history of its Polish and Jewish residents."

There are 4,500 headstones in the Jewish cemetery, founded at the end of the 18th century and one of Poland's largest. About 40,000 Jews lived in Czestochowa before World War II, comprising one-third of the city's population. Only 5,000 survived the Holocaust. About 100 Jews live there now.

At the cleanup, Wrona said: "Today our city is very open and positive to Jews both here and around the world. This terrible incident is not going to change that."

Poland's Chief Rabbi Michael Schudrich said the city "has made more efforts to commemorate its Jewish history than any city of its size in Poland.

"Poles feel things like this are not supposed to happen here," said Rabbi Schudrich, who, with the mayor and a local priest, cleaned a swastika from a grave.

He said he was not disappointed that only 22 town residents showed up for the afternoon cleanup, since it was announced just hours earlier and most town residents were either at work or away on vacation.

Since the end of the Communist regime, city officials have worked closely with philanthropist and Czestochowa native Sigmund Rolat to recover the city's Jewish past.

Rolat informed the police about the vandalism after he visited the graves of his family. He had recently funded the cemetery's renovation so that it could be open to the public.

"I am never speechless, but I couldn't speak for several minutes after seeing stone after stone covered with these signs," he said Tuesday by phone from New York. "This was unbelievably shocking."

Rolat, who lives in New York and Florida, sponsored a photo and historical exhibition of the Jews of Czestochowa that began travelling across the United States in 2004.

Along with the Taube Foundation, Rolat and the Polish government support Inspired by Jewish Culture, an annual nationwide art school contest to depict Jewish life in Poland.

City officials have also helped host several Czestochowa reunions of Jewish natives and their descendants. The most recent one featured a giant sukkah built by students from the local art school.

About a dozen students from that school were on hand to help with the cemetery cleanup. Local Jews also turned out to begin the work, which will be completed over the next week by paint removal experts.

Rolat said the inauguration in June of a Jewish culture centre in Czestochowa may have given some extremists a motive to vandalize the cemetery.

Wrona said the Polish media have noted a rising number of racist incidents in the region in recent years.

Rolat said he hoped the desecration could lead to a commitment from the city to provide better security for the cemetery, with regular patrols and perhaps a permanent watchman.

Camp in Ukraine helps build Jewish character

"We will come back home very joyful, and have new games and be healthy. They have a doctor here," said Sasha, 8, from Odessa.

Vova, also 8 and from Odessa, thought for a moment before he answered what he likes about camp.

"If we just hang around on the street, we will hang around and do nothing – here we learn," he said. "We learn about Shabbat, and I love Shabbat."

Both boys said that after this summer experience, they would call themselves Jewish before identifying as Ukrainian.

Of the 300 campers, Voskovoinik said that 40 per cent of them have never been to a JAFI camp and half of those have not had other Jewish exposure.

The Chabad movement also runs FSU summer camps, but Voskovoinik says that the two organizations are not in competition with each other. Many children go to both camps, and the groups try not to schedule them at the same time. There are also Hebrew day schools across Ukraine where children can get a Jewish education.

Maxim Peliansky, 19, is a counsellor at the Odessa camp. The local teen has worked in as many Jewish organizations and groups as he could find, but he said JAFI changed his thinking about how he can relate to children.

"Here I can be myself as a madrich," he said, using the Hebrew word for counsellor. "At other organizations, I was strictly instructed as to content. Here I can express myself."

All JAFI summer camps accept children who qualify under Israel's Right of Return law, meaning that they must have at least one Jewish grandparent. There is an interview process before registration, so that children and parents understand the educational component of the camps.

JAFI camps serves both the secular and Orthodox communities, and camp food is kosher.

The camps are free for families. In co-operation with a number of sponsors, JAFI spends about $10 million a year on the camps, which works out to about $500 per child for a weeklong session.

The high rate of intermarriage in FSU can make growing up Jewish confusing. Some campers only recently learned about their Jewish heritage, and many Jews in FSU are unaware of their heritage.

An anecdote journalists heard on our visit involved a man who, when asked by a JAFI emissary if he was Jewish, flippantly replied, "No. My mother is Jewish, that's all."

On the subject of intermarriage, Vosovoinik said, "We have to not cancel their world because we can't cancel a parent, but the world they get here can be part of it. We have to be very sensitive. It's very complex."

The second camp the journalists visited was an hour outside of Kharkov, a city with a population of almost two million people. This weeklong camp, for teens aged 13 to 17, revolved around the theme "Israel is Real."

The week was loosely based around life in Israel, with programs such as an end-of-high-school exam about Israel, university day, army training and a "Yad Vashem" tour.

The reporters joined the campers for several sessions, including a "Fear Factor" evening program (based on the television show) and a tour of a fabricated but realistic-looking Yad Vashem. At a dance party/evening program, the children divided into groups and gave presentations on what Israel meant to them.

The intensity of these young people's love for Israel came through in their presentations. They included song, dance, art, humour and speech to convey the message that Israel is, in fact, real.

"One goal of the camp is to create a Jewish identity with a multi-dimensional understanding of Israel as a crucial part of that identity for the next generation," said Jan Friedman, JAFI's education emissary for Kharkov and Donetsk, who runs the camp with her husband, Guy.

"The position of the camp is a very strong starting point – [campers] know it's the beginning of a process, they really get the idea of continuation," she said, adding that JAFI holds events for campers all year long at their Kharkov office.

Sasha Blitshtein, a madrich from Kharkov, understands the importance of recognizing and building Jewish identity among teens.

"Those who are here for the first time, they can be surprised at what they find, for good or for bad. Being Jewish can be something they don't understand or accept, or, something that makes them different. And being different at this age is an important thing," Blitshtein said.

The campers and madrichim agreed that being Jewish is a positive way to be different.

"I don't show my Jewishness publicly, but if someone asks me to fill out a form, I'm proud to do it," said Ella Karnitskaya, a 17-year-old Kharkov teen who recites the Shema every day and lights Shabbat candles with her mother.

"Other kids get piercings. This is my way of being different."

Katya Varkova, 24, is an Israeli madrich who made aliyah from Kharkov in 2000 and is back for camp. She said it's important to focus on Jewish identity, not only in the camp but also at home during the year.

"In the small cities with no Jewish community, how free do they feel to express their identities?" she asked.

Many Ukrainian villages and towns have tiny Jewish communities, and many cities also have relatively small Jewish populations, which might naturally lead some Jews to think about aliyah.

JAFI's goals focus on nation-building and identity-building, with Israel as a central goal to that identity. But they don't push aliyah on anyone.

"I personally made aliyah and believe Jews can and should – but I don't put it into the program as a message," said Voskovoinik, who left Riga in 1993 as a teen to study in Israel.

"I don't think there is a division – being Jewish means Israel. I believe that, but I don't tell children and their parents," she said.

Friedman said that "the goal is to make Israel a significant part of identity.

"This can be through aliyah, but within the overall goal of building community. Israel will be part of the community here. We really want them to make a rational choice from thinking from inside their identity."

Friedman made aliyah from Belarus in 1990.

Several of the counsellors and campers were considering or definitely planning to make aliyah, and most want to visit Israel.

The idea of aliyah can create a confusing tension with the goal of building a Jewish community in Ukraine for young Jews.

"That is the million-dollar question," said Rabbi Moshe Moscovitz in his Kharkov synagogue office. He came to Ukraine from Venezuela 17 years ago to head the Chabad synagogue, the only shul in the city. He arrived with one child and now has nine.

"The community is much more stable than it used to be, but everyone has at the back of their minds about going to Israel," he said.

"I don't tell them to go – I'm much more passive. I believe they should go, but they should come to the decision in a conscious way."

The message can be a confusing one for the younger generation.

"Community building is postponed because community leaders keep making aliyah," 19-year-old Edward Dolgin at the Kharkov camp summarized.

"I plan on making aliyah in two years, so it's not so important," he said.

"Definitely, there is a Jewish future here," said Voskovoinik, who is clearly passionate about the work she does to further that aim.

University leaders oppose boycott

JTA

NEW YORK — Nearly 300 university presidents signed on to a full-page advertisement in the Aug. 8 New York Times protesting the academic boycott of Israel.

"Boycott Israeli Universities? Boycott Ours, Too!" read the ad, organized by the American Jewish Committee in response to a proposed boycott of Israeli academic institutions by the British University and College Union. The ad featured a statement by Lee Bollinger, president of New York's Columbia University, that was endorsed by the other presidents.

"At Columbia, I am proud to say that we embrace Israeli scholars and universities that the UCU is now all too eager to isolate – as we embrace scholars from many countries regardless of divergent views on their government's policies," Bollinger wrote. "Therefore, if the British UCU is intent on pursuing its deeply misguided policy, then it should add Columbia to its boycott list, for we do not intend to draw distinctions between our mission and that of the universities you are seeking to punish. Boycott us, then, for we gladly stand together with our many colleagues in British, American and Israeli universities against such intellectually shoddy and politically biased attempts to hijack the central mission of higher education."

Among the signatories were the presidents of Brandeis University, the University of California-Berkeley, Northwestern University, Penn State, Tufts University and Princeton University.

Israel Briefs

No war with Syria: Olmert

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he sees no chance of war between Israel and Syria in the coming months. "I believe we can look forward to a calm summer, a calm fall and a calm winter," he told cabinet colleagues Aug. 8, sources said. "Israel has no intention of attacking Syria, and neither does Syria intend to attack Israel." The comments appeared to be an attempt to calm concern that a year after the Lebanon war, there could be another conflict on Israel's northern front.

Hebron squatters evicted

Israeli forces evicted Jewish settlers who had taken over disputed properties in Hebron. Thousands of soldiers and police descended on the West Bank city Aug. 7 to remove two Israeli families squatting in abandoned apartments. The evictions was resisted by settlers who pelted the security forces with stones. Four people were arrested and at least 30 injured, including several police officers. The settlers say the properties, converted stalls in Hebron's wholesale market, originally belonged to Jews. The city's Arab residents dispute the claim. Twelve soldiers who refused to take part in the evacuation were court-martialed and sent to the stockade. Most will serve 28-day sentences.

Land swap planned: report

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert plans to offer the Palestinians a state on most of the West Bank, with land allotments from Israel to make up for Jewish settlement blocs Israel would annex, Ha'aretz reported. The Aug. 7 report said the Olmert wants to recognize the Palestinians' claim to all of the West Bank, but instead of giving up Jewish settlements in the territory, he intends to offer the Palestinians land of equivalent size from inside the Jewish state. It may consist of Israeli Arab towns, an ethnic trade-off aimed at mollifying Olmert's rightist partners in the coalition government, the report said. Olmert's office denied the report, saying "such a plan has not been considered, nor is it being raised for discussion in any forum."

OSCE passes resolution to fight anti-Semitism

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Co-Operation in Europe (OSCE) has adopted a new resolution against anti-Semitism.

At its annual meeting in Kiev, Ukraine, last month, the 56-member body, comprising states from Europe, Central Asia and North America, produced its 2007 Kiev Declaration containing a comprehensive, six-page section on fighting anti-Semitism, racism, xenophobia and "other forms of intolerance" throughout Europe.

Among the dozens of points in the section, the document reminds all member states who played a role in the Holocaust of their historic "impact, and the continued acts of anti-Semitism occurring throughout [Europe] that are not unique to any one country and necessitate unwavering steadfastness by all participating states to erase the black mark on human history."

The OSCE resolution also asked its members to join together and denounce the "continuing intellectualization" of anti-Semitism among Europe's academia and called on them to ensure that Jews and minorities on campuses are protected from undue harassment. It also expressed specific concern about recent attempts to single out Israel for divestment and sanctions.

Senator Jerry Grafstein attended the OSCE parliamentary assembly last month in Kiev, Ukraine.

At the Kiev session, Canadian Senator Jerry Grafstein, who has worked with the organization for the last 12 years, was elected vice-president of the OSCE's parliamentary assembly.

Grafstein helped support and push through the resolution, which he said would provide "leadership in the struggle against the oldest of viruses of hate – anti-Semitism."

In a speech to the assembly, Grafstein cited images of World War II to emphasize the importance of fighting anti-Semitism in all its forms.

"After the lessons of World War II, most civilized persons began to hope and believe the postwar world would be free of such ancient hates… it was not to be."

Speaking to The CJN last week, Grafstein lamented the continued spread of anti-Semitism and Israel-bashing throughout Europe, particularly in the United Kingdom, but he praised the OSCE's resolution as a milestone.

"The largest parliamentary human rights organization in the world has taken this issue on," he said proudly. "We were very successful in getting most of the [members] to agree with the resolution, though it was not a unanimous vote."

The resolution was "heatedly" discussed before being passed, Grafstein said, noting that those opposed to the resolution, namely Britain and Denmark, objected to the section on divestment from and boycotts of Israel. He said they argued that it would mean any state who advocated for these measures would be automatically labelled as anti-Semitic.

"Our response… was no, we're not talking about Israel here, we're talking about institutions that happen to be Israeli," Grafstein said. "And yes, if you try and boycott and criticize those institutions, and you don't do it in the appropriate way as you do other institutions, then you are anti-Semitic, because you're singling out Jewish institutions for this type of egregious conduct."

The counter-argument helped carry the motion, he said.

New measures were also put into place to help monitor the progress of the resolution and track their effectiveness from year to year, Grafstein said.

"We're trying to attack the problem systematically… and have parliamentarians go back to their countries and actually do something, then come back and report [to the OSCE], not just draw up resolutions."

Grafstein said the OSCE is scheduled to hold a "side meeting" in Toronto in September 2008 in which he plans to lead a discussion on anti-Semitism.

'Jewish' cardinal was link to interfaith world

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — As he lay dying earlier this month in a Paris hospice, Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger reached out to his longtime friend Rabbi Israel Singer.

The Jewish-born Catholic official, who served for decades as a conduit between the Vatican and the Jewish community, called Rabbi Singer, a former senior official of the World Jewish Congress and a major player in the effort to build Catholic-Jewish ties. Rabbi Singer flew to Paris and the two met several times before Lustiger succumbed to cancer on Aug. 5. He was 80.

"He was completely conscious and aware," said Rabbi Singer, who called Cardinal Lustiger by his Hebrew name. "Some of the conversations were 25 years old. They were very moving."

Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger

Born Aaron Lustiger in Paris in 1926, he was the first child of secular Polish-Jewish emigres. In 1940, he was sent with his sister to live with a Catholic woman following the German occupation of France. In August of that year, at age 13, he was baptized, adding Jean-Marie to his name.

Cardinal Lustiger was a central figure in Catholic-Jewish reconciliation efforts that characterized the tenure of Pope John Paul II, with whom he was close. He served as John Paul's representative at the commemoration ceremonies marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz in 2005.

As archbishop of Paris, Cardinal Lustiger served as a diplomatic back-channel, relaying to the Vatican Jewish concerns regarding Catholic anti-Semitism and the building of a convent at the Auschwitz death camp.

The latter issue had a special resonance for Cardinal Lustiger because his mother, Gisele, perished there.

A longtime proponent of interreligious reconciliation, Cardinal Lustiger was nevertheless seen as a troubling figure by the small cohort of Jewish leaders who regularly engaged their Catholic counterparts in dialogue.

Though widely admired for his warmth and friendliness, even those close to him acknowledged their discomfort sitting across from a man who had willingly converted to Catholicism and yet continued to speak of himself as a Jew.

"I was born Jewish, and so I remain, even if that is unacceptable for many," Cardinal Lustiger once told an interviewer.

"For me, the vocation of Israel is bringing light to the goyim," he said, referring to the Hebrew term for non-Jews. "That is my hope, and I believe that Christianity is the means for achieving it."

In an interview soon after being named archbishop by Pope John Paul II, he told an interviewer, "For me this nomination was as if, all of a sudden, the crucifix began to wear a yellow star."

One Jewish leader who met Cardinal Lustiger many times in the context of interreligious dialogue said such comments underscore what he saw as the "problematic" nature of the endeavor.

"He said that as a Catholic he is a fulfilled Jew," said the leader, who asked not to be identified. "It implies that if you do not share that faith then you're not complete."

"It took awhile for Jewish leaders to recognize that he was not proselytizing but that he was really sincere in seeing himself as a bridge that could help reconciliation," said Rabbi James Rudin, a past chairman of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations.

Even Rabbi Singer, who was close to Cardinal Lustiger and hosted him in his home, said he was deeply uncomfortable at their first meeting.

"It was almost impossible for me," Rabbi Singer said. "I was embarrassed to tell people that we were meeting."

If it was hard for his Jewish interlocutors, it seems to have been equally hard for Cardinal Lustiger himself.

In the 1970s he was reported to have considered leaving France for Israel, but he remained and quickly rose up the Church ranks. He became bishop of Orleans in 1979 and archbishop of Paris in 1981. Two years later, John Paul made him a cardinal. He retired in 2005.

During a 1995 visit to Israel coinciding with Holocaust Remembrance Day, Lustiger was vilified by Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, who accused him of betraying his people at their darkest hour.

"To say that I am no longer a Jew is like denying my father and mother, my grandfathers and grandmothers," Cardinal Lustiger responded. "I am as Jewish as all the other members of my family who were butchered in Auschwitz or in the other camps."

In a lighter moment during an appearance at Tel Aviv University, Lustiger was asked if he could become the next pope. He replied using the Yiddish word for crazy: "Meshuggeh."

Lustiger was buried Aug. 10 in Notre Dame cathedral in a ceremony that included the recitation of Kaddish.

Hundreds of people, including prominent Jewish leaders of France, Holocaust survivors and French President Nicolas Sarkozy, gathered to see Cardinal Lustiger's coffin carried through a crowd and placed on the stone square in front of the 12th century cathedral.

The cardinal's great-nephew read a psalm in Hebrew and French, and placed a bowl of earth gathered from meaningful Jewish and Christian sites in Israel.

An 83-year-old Nazi death camp survivor and cousin of the cardinal, Arno Lustiger, then led the reading of the Mourner's Kaddish.

Cardinal Lustiger's sucessor, Cardinal Andre Vingt-Trois, said Cardinal Lustiger wanted members of his family, Jews and Christians, and his friends to say some traditional prayers for the dead.

Olmert says needs in northern Israel exaggerated

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the problems in war-struck northern Israel are exaggerated, and he described American charitable donations to help the region as important, but he stopped short of calling them necessary.

Olmert made his comments Aug. 8 to a delegation of American journalists who had come to Israel on a mission organized by the United Jewish Communities to showcase how $360 million raised from donors across the world were being used to aid the north's recovery after last summer's war with Hezbollah. His office stipulated that Olmert could be paraphrased but not directly quoted.

The prime minister, whose government has faced criticism over its perceived failures in responding to the needs in the north, told the visiting journalists that the situation in the area is not dire. The economy is booming, he said.

Asked if the North American money given to Israel was "necessary," he would say only that it is important and significant. Olmert went on to say that Israel is happy to receive money and that it is helpful, but necessity depends on the attitude of the giver and receiver. Americans had to give money and Israel wanted to receive it, he said.

Some previous prime ministers also have balked at portraying Israel as a needy country. Olmert did not appear to be criticizing American Jewish organizations as his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, did in 2003 when he slammed them over fundraising efforts that highlighted hunger in Israel.

But Olmert's Aug. 8 comments came in the middle of efforts to highlight the success of the Israel Emergency Campaign, which federation leaders have hailed as vital to helping Israel's immediate and long-term recovery from the conflict, and as evidence of the UJC's relevance and effectiveness.

His remarks last week struck a different tone from comments he made when UJC launched its emergency campaign last summer in the midst of the war. At that time Olmert said he was relying on American Jewry to help "rehabilitate our cities."

In response to Olmert's comments last week, UJC officials lauded the performance of the organization and its partners, the Jewish Agency for Israel and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

Howard Rieger, UJC's president and chief executive officer, said he was proud of the impact the funds have made on the region. According to Rieger, the funds have provided loans for businesses that would have failed, contributed to educational programs and addressed the psychological needs of residents affected by the trauma.

"I don't think there's ever been a hint" from anyone involved in the process "that the direction wasn't a relevant direction," said Rieger, who spoke to JTA from Florida and was not at last week's meeting with Olmert. "The feedback on the ground has been terrific."

Rieger said that after hearing about Olmert's remarks, his only response was "to be introspective and ask if what we've done has been meaningful and had an impact."

The answer, he said, was yes.

SO MUCH FUNUKAH!
CELEBRATE YOUR BAR/BAT MITZVAH LIKE A ROCK STAR!
TWO GREAT LOCATIONS IN TORONTO
Hard Rock CAFE
TORONTO

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, "Bubbie's" birthday or a business banquet, you'll always be treated like a rock star at Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre (formerly the Skydome).

With a combined 27,000-square feet, including nightclubs and streetside patios, Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre offer a vast array of configurations for a wide variety of events, from five to 500 people, breakfast through late-night.

Marcelo DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager for Hard Rock Cafe: "We've hosted countless bar mitzvahs, wedding receptions, product launches and press conferences. We've put on events for all types of companies, from Deloitte & Touche and The Toronto Star, to BMG Music. Guests love Hard Rock. It's a very unique environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on Hard Rock Cafe Toronto's walls, such as Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. Guests will also see a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen – better known as Paul Stanley of KISS – as well as a beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

And as a testament to the old adage, "rock 'n' roll never dies," Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre boasts dueling walls of The Rolling Stones' and The Beatles' memorabilia. So far, The Beatles are ahead with 23 pieces, including the hand-written lyrics to "Get Back." But if Brit Rock isn't your thing, you can check out some cool stuff from this side of the pond, like the guitar Jimi Hendrix used when recording "Little Wing," the jacket Buddy Holly wore on tour or Bo Diddley's guitar "Lucille." There is a tribute room to the "King" himself, where you can get a peek at Elvis's silk pajamas, among other things.

After the tour, DeOliveira explains that this is all part of the experience, that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "For instance, you can have a sit-down dinner or a buffet. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the cafes. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us, you're a rock star."

Kindergarten & Child Care Combined

Upper Canada Child Care Centres is a growing family of 50 child care centres throughout York Region, North York, and Simcoe county. In addition to operating quality, non-profit care for children ages 3 months to 12 years, four of our centres also offer specialized programs which combine junior and senior kindergarten education with a full day child care component. These kindergarten programs run five days per week for the full year. The Curriculum emphasizes language, mathematics, science and technology, personal and social development and the arts.

Educators facilitate the child's growth by providing a rich and stimulating program. Balanced to provide learning opportunities in all educational areas, our program offers carefully planned and monitored learning centres. These concrete experiences promote competency and encourage self esteem.

Some of the many advantages to this program include: low child:adult ratios, a single location for kindergarten & child care, daily contact with teachers and no alternate day schedules.

Extended hours, nutritious lunches and snacks are provided at no extra charge. Please see our ad for the Upper Canada Kindergarten Program nearest you. For more information on any Upper Canada program, please call our Head Office at 905-946-1113 or visit www.uppercanadachildcare.com.

Oraynu – A Sunday School Families Love!

"My son really looks forward to Sunday mornings."

This comment is typical of the parents whose children attend Oraynu. We teach Jewish history and culture from a Humanistic perspective, focusing on values.

Children are truly engaged at Oraynu and learn through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches.

The children "do" and "act" through lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education events, tzedakah projects, music, Hebrew, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of fun.

"My daughter feels good about being Jewish."

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is enjoyable as the children experience positive affirmations of their Jewishness in every class.

"The B'nai Mitzvah blew me away. I was so moved by the ceremony."

Imagine a B'nai Mitzvah program where students choose their own projects, based on modern Jewish heroes, ancient sages, humour, authors, anti-semitism, etc. Individual ceremonies are offered; Torah reading is optional.

If your family is secular and looking for a school where Judaism feels right, perhaps you belong at Oraynu. Intercultural families are very welcome.

The Academy For Gifted Children – P.A.C.E.

The Academy for Gifted Children - P.A.C.E. is the only private school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E, is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers programs from Grade 1 through Grade 12. In addition to the basic skills, P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction, and a more complex approach to learning. A fully balanced program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program. Please call the school for registration information: 905-773-0997.

Need Help with the University Application Process?

Approaching application deadlines. Personal statements. Preparing for interviews. Distinguishing yourself from the crowd. It can all seem overwhelming.

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many undergraduate and professional programs including medicine, law, business and dentistry, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Since applications to postsecondary schools have doubled in the last ten years, gaining admission to university requires careful planning – even for students with impressive credentials. No aspect of the application process can be overlooked.

Expert advice can make the process less daunting, allowing students to maximize their chances of success. We work one-on-one with our clients throughout the application process. The result is the strongest application possible, one that highlights each student's unique character and individual strengths.

You can do it.

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

Six years ago, after a long career as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents. Since then, she has worked with over 500 students on their way to academic success.

Judy Libman advises each student as a unique individual: no "one-size-fits-all" answers here. For high school students, Libman identifies university or college programs that will provide the best match for a student's interests, goals and learning style. Her familiarity with programs in Ontario and across Canada gives students a wide range of choices.

Libman is also well-known for her expert counseling in US college admissions. She serves as a consultant for US college admissions at several top Toronto private schools.

For students already in university, Libman provides advising on career options, graduate programs, and professional school admissions. Her longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Judy Libman also counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows how to work with both students and institutions to overcome barriers.

For more information on Ambitions Educational Consulting, visit www.ambitions.ca or phone 416-780-0288 for an appointment.

The hardest questions in school aren't on the exam.

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

Freemont is a private secondary school where students receive an enriching education in an empowering environment. School life is positive, stressing co-operation and constructive academic guidance with the mandate of realistically preparing students for university. The school day starts at 10:00 a.m. and consists of two longer class periods throughout the day, allowing for real learning - not just hurried "crowd control." With an enrolment of approximately 60 students, there is no back row at Freemont. Our small classes create a nurturing environment for students to take risks - and they do. In fact, they thrive. Freemont offers a focused, innovative learning experience that students will be able to take with them not only into university, but also into life. Freemont Academy's Principal is Sean Meggeson.

Give Your Child An Educational Advantage

The Math Masters/Don Valley Academy student understands that the learning process is not a universal approach. The student is an individual, and each individual must apply the most effective and efficient means to reach his or her goal of academic excellence. Personalized and self-paced learning programs cater to the needs and diverse learning styles of each student. Whether enrolled in private tutoring, a credit course, or a support/enrichment program, the instructor will challenge and motivate the student to attain academic success.

Math Masters tutoring programs emphasize effective study skills, time management, organizational skills, motivational techniques, and memory training. The Math Masters student will experience an improvement in grades and long-term retention of learned material, as well as an increase in confidence and self-esteem.

Don Valley Academy is an accredited, ministry-inspected private high school, offering credit courses for students from grades nine to twelve. What makes Don Valley Academy different is the flexibility in the delivery of its courses. Students may join a small class or they can opt for private study, working individually with their teacher. This is most beneficial to the student who needs additional attention, or requires a flexible schedule.

Educator aims to improve health-care education

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Since Lorie Shekter-Wolfson was appointed to the Toronto Central Local Health Integration Network (LHIN) as co-chair of its new Education and Research Council four months ago, she has been eager to implement her ideas in an effort to improve the way health-care professionals are educated.

Lorie Shekter-Wolfson

Shekter-Wolfson, the dean of community services and health sciences at George Brown College, said she is excited about the opportunity to examine and improve the health-care system beyond the institutions, by making sure that whether people are educated at college or university, they will be properly prepared to work together.

"We should be delivering health care beyond institutions because our bodies aren't determined by institutions. It is really based on continuum of care. Health-care education should be the same [throughout the province] because at the end of the day, these people have to work together in the system," she said.

Despite the fact that a majority of health-care professionals, including nurses, have been educated in the college system, she added, the role of colleges is often underrated.

"Our goal is to develop a strategy to look at the way of approaching the diversity of [methods] being used to support clinical education within the Toronto Central LHIN so that students, organizations and service users can benefit."

Shekter-Wolfson, who has worked for the Ontario government's Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care, said her goals as the co-chair of the education and research council parallel her goals for George Brown, where she has worked since 2002.

She said students at George Brown are now studying in controlled applied learning environments, where they will hopefully better understand how to integrate their roles and deliver the best patient care.

Through this new program, students are learning to take a holistic approach with patients in the areas of dental health, nursing, health and wellness. Another aspect of the program provides a simulation of in-patient health-care environments, which offers them the opportunity to have hands-on practice.

As a member of Health Canada's Interprofessional Education for Collaborative Patient-Centred Practice's national expert committee and through her involvement with Jewish Family & Child of Greater Toronto, Shekter-Wilson has the experience needed to determine what areas need improvement.

"One of the things that we're trying to do is to develop what is an ideal, what an ideal state of education and research would look like for the Toronto Central LHIN and then determine what it is we want to work on because as a committee, our goals are to be… able to start looking at things across the spectrum."

She said she hopes that meetings with the committee, which is made up of some of Ontario's influential doctors and health-care professionals, will result in tangible benefits for Ontarians.

"If we can talk about how we can look at health-care education and practicum in a more holistic professional focus, at the end of the day, it is going to support better collaborative practice, [and] minimize mistakes – because more people die of mistakes than they do of various diseases, primarily because of [a lack of] information and not knowing how to work as a team."

Shekter-Wolfson is optimistic about the direction that Ontario's health-care system is going, and predicted that it will continue to improve.

"There is a thing called Health Force Ontario, and [Ontario's minister of health and long-term care George] Smitherman has made it clear that we need to ensure that we are educating our professionals in the right way to better maximize the care that is given to a patient. We know that we need to do better in terms of health-care access, and there have already been research projects that have come out of the province through Health Force Ontario's initiative to support interprofessional education projects."

She said she'd like the health-care system to resemble the oral health system, where dentists get a lot of support from dental hygienists and other technicians, and predicted that patients will continue to see the benefits of better practice.

"I think it will continue to improve as the students get better prepared, not their individual skills… but other skills are required around communication, around the maximization of roles."

Walk or run to help kids with diabetes

The Diabetes Walk for Hope in support of children and adolescents who live with diabetes is set for Sept. 23, 10 a.m., at Étienne Brûlé Park, which is in walking distance from the Old Mill subway station.

The five-kilometre walk or run raises funds for the Diabetes Hope Foundation, which awards scholarships for students living with Type 1 and Type 2 diabetes and supports Camp Huronda, a non-profit camp for children with diabetes.

The foundation also runs a medical assistance program, which helps children living with diabetes whose families are not covered by third-party health plans and who struggle to obtain the medical supplies and drugs needed to control the diabetes.

A foundation press release states that the average cost per patient for these supplies is anywhere from $200 to $350 per month, up to $4,000 per year, per patient. For lower income families and new immigrants with no third-party insurance coverage, these costs can be staggering, it says.

The foundation also partners with pediatric hospitals and pharmaceutical companies to ensure financial obstacles are not barriers to obtaining the best diabetes health care.

For information or to volunteer for the walk, e-mail walk@diabeteshopefoundation.com or call at 905-670-0557, ext. 256.

Sponsors for the walk include Alberto Culver, Citigroup, Diet Canada Dry Ginger Ale, Fluid Hose & Coupling, Kernels Popcorn, MBC Development Ltd., Marathon Watch Co. Ltd., Nortown Foods, The 5-Factor Diet, Toronto International Film Festival and Quagmire Golf.

Young Toronto paramedics – sirens, lights and stretchers

By Abigail Bimman
CJN Intern

I'm tearing down the wrong side of Yonge Street at 100 klicks, lights spinning and sirens blazing – but I'm not scared. The driver I'm sitting beside, Jason Benaim, has delivered four babies and saved countless lives.

I went on an ambulance ride with paramedics Benaim and Carole Smith, who work 12-hour shifts. I met them at 6:45 one morning at 16 Station, at Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue.

"Lights and sirens on your first call – not bad," said Smith, 28, en route to a call just after 7 a.m.

Emergency calls come in as either alpha, bravo, charlie, delta or echo, in order of increasing urgency, based on the information received at the dispatch call centre of Toronto Emergency Medical Services (EMS).

This one was a delta. A man had passed out in the bathroom at work (confidentiality rules prohibit specific information disclosure).

Over the next 12 hours plus, we received three more calls – a charlie for a woman who fainted, an alpha for an adverse reaction to new medication, and another charlie for what was suspected to be a stroke but ended up being a slightly confused elderly woman with pain in her face.

"It's a funny job," said Smith, leaning on the open door at the back of the ambulance, one leg up on the truck, waiting for Benaim to fill out forms at Humber River Regional Hospital, Finch Avenue Site. She was referring to the system's occasional mistakes, specifically recalling an alpha call she once received for cardiac arrest, which typically would be an echo.

Humber Finch was one of three hospitals I visited that day. And wait times were fast, except for the last call of the evening. For that one, we stayed almost an hour past shift before being relieved by another paramedic.

"I've had six or seven calls where I can honestly say that without our intervention they'd be dead," said Benaim, 32.

He has been a paramedic for four years and loves that his job isn't monotonous.

"You see something different every day. There's no redundancy," he said.

"There's excitement, there's an adrenaline rush. You see people at their best and at their worst as well, and all across the spectrum."

He said you need a high level of curiosity and maturity for the job, and his own enthusiasm is clear. While in the passenger seat of the ambulance or waiting for a call at the station, he eagerly teaches me about the workings of the heart, what information the SAT (blood oxygen) monitor records or the causes of low blood pressure.

Benaim said he always knew he wanted to be a paramedic but earned a university degree and worked as a bar manager before going to paramedicine college, receiving the two-year diploma mandatory for paramedics.

Paramedic Jason Benaim performs life-saving measures in the most extreme circumstances.

Benaim is a level 1 paramedic. In Toronto, there are three levels, designated by shoulder stripes. Paramedics are also divided into primary care paramedics (PCP, and levels 1 and 2) and advanced care paramedics (ACP, level 3). Those with level 3 designations do additional tasks, such as starting intravenous lines.

In the past 20 years, Benaim says paramedicine has changed a lot. Paramedics are now allowed to give a death pronouncement when a doctor approves it over the phone; previously the doctor would have had to make the pronouncement in person.

Respect for paramedics has grown, Benaim said, so that people think of them as much more than "ambulance drivers," a moniker he strongly dislikes.

"I wouldn't have said it was a valid career choice 20 years ago – the respect level was lower. We were sometimes known as the dirty third cousin of emergency services. We still have a long way to go, but we're getting there."

Waiting for a call at 16 Station, the paramedics discuss why they aren't often in the limelight. Part of the problem, the group agrees, is that at the emergency scene, paramedics are long gone with the injured when the media shows up, leaving the public to hear from police or fire services.

"Paramedics are the 'face' of the health system for the most critically ill and injured citizens in any community," said Dr. Brian Schwartz, the director of the Sunnybrook Osler Centre for Prehospital Care.

"Their skills are unique in that they perform life-saving – and symptom relief and comfort – measures in the most extreme circumstances – dark, cold, sometimes potentially dangerous environments – with the sickest and most distressed individuals."

Being Jewish can give a paramedic an advantage in dealing with Jewish patients.

"People like to be taken care of by their own," said level 1 paramedic Michael Conforti, who has been at the job for six years.

Known at EMS as the only person on the job who wears a kippah, Conforti became more observant a few years ago and said that he now spends "half his life" doing shift changes so he can be off work on Shabbat. He said that since he started wearing a kippah, he noticed a change in his behaviour and also in others' perceptions of him.

"Anything you do as a Jew… whether a paramedic, businessman or street sweeper – if you are doing it in a good, positive, ethical way, you are doing it the Jewish way. If you do it with passion and caring, you are doing it kiddush HaShem," said Conforti, 32.

Shachar Gabay, 36, immigrated from Israel after working as a medic in the army and is now a level 2 paramedic after nine years on the job. For him, being Jewish can also make a positive difference on certain calls.

"If I meet an Israeli family and start talking Hebrew, it changes the whole dynamic of the call. Instead of looking at you as an authority figure, you can just see the barrier melt away."

Gabay said when he get calls from Holocaust survivors, they are often very nervous at the sight of someone in uniform.

"You can see it in their eyes. And sometimes they tell you, the minute we walk in it reminded them of this or that."

Gabay, Conforti and Benaim estimate there are only a handful of Jews among the approximate 900 EMS paramedics in Toronto.

"I think it's a great career, I think it's a very challenging career, and I hope to see more Jews, more of us, choosing that profession. There's a lot to be proud of," Gabay said.

- The Markham Jazz Festival unrolls on Aug. 17, 18 and 19, with a lively roster of entertainment that includes the Hilario Durham Big Band, Tom Van Seters Quartet and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band (Sunday, 12:30 to 2 p.m.) www.markhamjazzfestival.com
- The Association of Artists for a Better World presents the sixth annual Concert For Peace, a free family day of blues, roots and world music with themes of peace. Rain or shine. Mel Lastman Square, Aug. 18, 2 to 10 p.m. www.abetterworld.ca
- The Toronto Symphony Orchestra has announced an online seat sale designed to offer music fans affordable subscription packages. For one week beginning Aug. 13, TSO concert tickets will go for $39 each with a minimum of three tickets purchased. www.tso.ca
- Running Aug. 23 to 26 in the St. Lawrence Market neighbourhood, the eighth annual Scotiabank BuskerFest is raising donations and awareness for Epilepsy Toronto. This year's festival features Jack's Rainbow, inspired by Jack Yeilding, a four-year-old boy who set up a fundraising lemonade stand outside his Oakville home last summer and raised $14,000 for Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, the hospital that oversees his epilepsy treatment.
- The Year My Parents Went On Vacation, a feature film that ran at the last Toronto Jewish Film Festival, opens in a Toronto-area theatre this week for a limited commercial run. Set amidst the backdrop of a World Cup-crazy 1970s Brazil, this poignant coming-of-age film tells the story of 11-year-old Mauro, a child of Communist parents who are secretly on the run from the police.

Israeli Yiddish singer debuts CD

Music Reviews

Vira Lozinsky
Vayte Shtern

Vira Lozinsky

For most of its 30 year or so history, the Yiddish music revival has been a largely North American and European phenomenon.

Ironically perhaps, Israel has done little to nourish this cultural renaissance, prioritizing Hebrew and the nation's contemporary Middle Eastern cultural context over the lost world of the European shtetl. As Israeli klezmer musician Assaf Talmudi recently told the Jerusalem Post, "The Yiddish language and culture were sacrificed to build Israel."

There are, however, signs of an underground Yiddish music revival emerging in Israel. One of the leading lights of this nascent movement is Tel Aviv's Vira Lozinsky, a protégé of the legendary Yiddish singer Nehama Lifshitz.

Lozinsky has just released her stunning debut CD Vayte Shtern (Distant Stars) and makes her debut North American concert appearances this month in Montreal and Toronto, and at the KlezKanada Festival in Quebec.

Like many of the new voices of Yiddish culture in Israel, Lozinsky's roots go back to eastern Europe. She was born and raised in the Bessarabian town of Beltz, now in the Republic of Moldova, moving to Israel in her teen years during the post-Soviet Jewish emigration of the early 1990s. On her new CD, Lozinsky pays homage to those roots, featuring a number of songs written by Bessarabian Jewish singers and poets, including such legends as Itsik Manger, Moishe Oysher and Zelik Barditshever.

Also notable is Lozinsky's extensive collaboration on the CD with her father, Michael Felsenbaum, a respected Yiddish poet, author and dramatist, who contributes to this collection a number of his own original Yiddish songs, as well as Yiddish translations of Bessarabian Roma (Gypsy) songs.

Lozinsky's powerful alto is vibrant and warm – the perfect instrument to convey this unique and highly original repertoire. Her acute attention to dynamics and lyrical nuance make the performances on the CD even more commanding, vividly evoking the "land of wine and sadness" about which she sings. One cannot help being drawn into the mythic Bessarabian landscape of these songs, filled with pastoral images of green fields, lonely shepherds, forlorn young maidens and star-filled skies that conjure dreams and hopes.

Wisely avoiding the nostalgic kitsch that too many contemporary Yiddish singers embrace, Lozinsky and her longtime collaborator, pianist Regina Dricker, have crafted thoughtful arrangements that reveal a deep respect for the material and the idiom, while still expressing a unique personal style.

Lozinsky shines vibrantly on Vayte Shtern, and her star will no doubt soon shine across the international Yiddish culture scene, as a premier performer of Yiddish song and as a leader of a new generation of Israeli Yiddish singers.

Vira Lozinsky performs in Montreal at the Annual Yiddish Concert in the Park on Aug. 16 and in Toronto at Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre in Earl Bales Park on Aug. 28, 7 p.m. For details, visit www.ashkenazfestival.com or www.viralozinsky.com. She's at the KlezKanada Festival in Quebec, Aug. 20 to 26.

Lithuanian Empire CD a cause for celebration

The eight-piece band consists of talented musicians from across Canada and the United States, including renowned drummer Lorie Wolf, clarinettist Kinneret Sagee and veteran pianist-singer Fern Lindzon, all Toronto jazz scenesters.

Music Reviews

After meeting one another at KlezKanada in Montreal in 2005, an impromptu, raucous jam session among the members convinced the group to move forward as a band.

Two years later and the Lithuanian Empire has achieved what it set out to do, as it says in the CD's liner notes, to create a "spiritual fusion of sound."

The band describes its music as "pickled herring, bagels and lox, and kugel meet Led Zeppelin, margaritas and Nils Landgren to make beautiful harmonies on the streets of Harlem… make that Vilnius."

With a description like that, one expects a rip-roarin' musical experience; and the Empire doesn't disappoint.

The album has an open, jam-like feel to it, and you can almost see the musicians smiling at one another as they recorded, revelling in their music and likely laughing in their brief klezmerfied Led Zeppelin tribute halfway through the affair.

Ranging in style from the opening a- cappella Tisch Nign I through to the saucy, playful, up-tempo jaunts of Balkan Balabusteh, Sushi for Shabbes and aSHERville, to the closing niggun, Tisch Nign III, the Lithuanian Empire manages to interject an array of musical influences while still keeping that old-time klezmer feel.

Throughout Wolf lays down impressive, intricate beats, while clarinettists Sagee and Connecticut resident Becky Wexler joyfully pull the tunes along.

Meanwhile, Edmontonian Ryan Purchase keeps the sound honest with punctuating trombone bursts, and Montrealer Eva Boodman heralds mightily on the opening strains of the traditional Ol' Daddy Sizzlegut and elsewhere with her solid trumpeteering.

Montrealers Randal Pierce and Moti Ludmer lend their happy accordion-playing to the album, and North Carolina native Andy John performs triple-duty as guitarist/ bassist/ harmonica player, laying down tracks of rock-solid bass work and tasteful guitar all through the CD.

Not to be missed is the album's sixth track, Tisch Nign II, which stands out as a short, sad and beautiful divergent piano composition by Lindzon and should be listened to and absorbed with eyes closed.

For more information, visit www.thelithuanianempire.com.

Lithuanian Empire performs at Klez Kanada Aug. 20-26, in Lantier, Que.; on Aug. 28, at La Sala Rossa in Montreal; on Aug. 29, at Avant-Garde in Ottawa; and in Toronto on Aug. 30, at the Lula Lounge; and Sept.2, at the Rex Hotel.

Chassidic mom pens stories about everyday life

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A surprise French-language bestseller last summer in Quebec was a collection of heartwarming and humorous stories about the everyday life of an Outremont chassidic family. Written under a pseudonym by a grandmother from that community, it was entitled Lekhaim! Chroniques de la vie hassidique à Montréal.

The collection by "Malka Ziporahh" has now been published in the original English as Rather Laugh Than Cry: Stories from a Hassidic Household by Montreal's Véhicule Press.

The 25 semi-autobiographical stories, illustrated with the author's own drawings, offer a rare portrait of an insular and often misunderstood people by one of its members.

The book's popularity is not due to any dirty linen aired. This is not a tell-all; there is nothing in this book that should upset the community.

What it does do is put a human face on the Outremont Chassidim, about whom most Montrealers know little other than the negative media coverage of "accommodating" their differences.

Ziporah charmingly chronicles the small joys and trials of running a busy household, describing emotions that any mother could relate to, although few raise 12 children as she did and live according to a tradition that governs all aspects of life literally from waking up in the morning to going to bed at night, and assigns men and women such clearly defined roles.

Going by these stories, it is an almost idyllic existence, with its unchanging rhythms and faith in a higher power. The writing reveals the wisdom and serenity that comes with experience, and it has enough wryness to elevate the humour from the pollyannish.

As she explains: "History shows us that what is fashionable and proper in one era can be deemed cruel and immoral in another. The most stable foothold is, through good times and bad, to cling to the tried and true values handed down to us by our parents."

In The Red Pants, a mother speaks of her sentimental attachment to a pair of little trousers that she bought 20 years earlier for the exorbitant sum of $16 for her eldest son Moishy, and that have been passed down to his younger siblings until they are little more than a rag.

In A Fishy Tale, daughter Sheindl finally wheedles her reluctant mother into buying her a goldfish, just like her friend Raizy's. However, as Mom expected, the pet soon loses its appeal when Sheindl realizes it is a living creature that gets dirty and doesn't always behave nicely.

Making challah and kreplach, trying to live according to the teachings of the sages of old, juggling heavy schedules of social commitments, and sharing information through the "Women's Communication Network" are all fodder for Ziporah's imaginative mind.

There are gentle rants about dependence on the telephone, the expense of orthodontics, cold weather, and learning how to use a computer, and some sadness, such as the bittersweetness of Shavuot for Hungarian Jews because it was around that time that many were deported to Auschwitz and other camps.

The only story that makes any reference to non-chassidic neighbours is Squeezing in a Succah. The narrator's worry that her unhandy son-in-law's white vinyl balcony hut is an eyesore to "the non-Jewish Outremont dwellers who are accustomed to a city that is as well groomed as the poodles and pedigreed canines that they elegantly lead around the streets."

In the introduction, the author offers insight into what makes her tick, why family and customs are all-important to her, and her need to bring order to chaos. Humour has enabled her, and Chassidim in general, to "rather laugh than cry." Happiness is always mixed with sorrow in the Chassidim's collective memory.

Ziporah, 52, was born in Israel to Hungarian Holocaust-survivor parents. She grew up in Australia and has been living in Montreal since marrying 33 years ago. Today, her children range in age from nine to over 30.

She has been writing as a pastime for most of her married life, and has published more than 100 stories in small publications aimed at Orthodox Jewish readers.

That these stories ever reached a wider audience is, as she would say, bashert. About six years ago, Université du Québec à Montréal student Julie Gagnon interviewed Ziporah for research she was doing on synagogues in Outremont. The author happened to mention that she did some writing and gave Gagnon a few samples. Gagnon's professor at UQAM was none other than Pierre Anctil, who has devoted some 25 years to studying the Montreal Jewish community and fostering understanding between francophone and Jewish Quebecers.

He immediately recognized the stories' potential to dispel misconceptions about Chassidim, and persuaded a reluctant Ziporah to let him translate them into French. She insisted, however, on remaining anonymous Malka Ziporah is her mother's name – not wishing for celebrity or any change in her way of life.

Finding a publisher was not easy; the major houses were not interested.

Finally, Anctil turned to the small Les éditions du passage, owned by the daughter of an acquaintance.

Lekhaim! became the bestselling book Les éditions ever published in its relatively brief history, hitting the top-10 French books list last August, and going into second printing after the first 2,000 copies were sold.

Ziporah sees divine providence in the unexpected success of her stories.

"Through what many might conceive as coincidence, they were destined to spread to a wider and more diverse readership," she writes in the preface. To her new English readers she introduces herself this way: "I am a Hassidic Mom, and I gingerly pull the curtains aside and invite you to peek inside and see things as they are. Please make allowances for the toys on the floor, and the cookie crumbs. It is impossible to be perfect."

Gruber's top 10 places to visit

JTA

Ruth Ellen Gruber, author of Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to Eastern Europe, has shared her top 10 favourite Jewish places to visit.

- The historic Jewish cemeteries and painted synagogues in northern Romania. The most impressive cemeteries are the three in Siret, on the border with Ukraine. Nearby towns with painted synagogues and cemeteries include Botosani, Suceava, Radauti and Piatra Neamt.
- The Jewish cemeteries and ruins of fortress synagogues in Ukraine. In Sataniv, the synagogue hauntingly retains some of its interior decoration and the tombstones feature elaborate carving. The village of Sharhorod has a fortress synagogue, fascinating cemeteries, extensive remains of shtetl architecture and a small Jewish community.
- The baroque synagogue and Jewish cemetery in the village of Mad, in northeastern Hungary.
- The synagogues in Lancut, in southeastern Poland, and in Tykocin, in northeastern Poland.
- The old Jewish quarters, synagogues and cemeteries in the towns of Boskovice, Trebic and Lomnice, near Brno in the Czech Republic.
- Anything to do with the Hungarian architect Lipot Baumhorn (1860-1932), modern Europe's most prolific designer of synagogues.

Particularly recommended are the grand synagogue in Szeged, Hungary, and a ruined synagogue in Lucenec, Slovakia; Baumhorn's tomb in the Kozma Utca Jewish cemetery in Budapest; and the monument to him outside the former synagogue he designed in Szolnok, Hungary.

- Wooden synagogues. About a dozen simple wooden synagogues survive in out-of-the way villages in Lithuania. Most look like barns. The ones in the villages of Kurkliai, Pakruojis and Ziezmariai are particularly striking.
- The elaborate synagogue in Subotica, Serbia, is an extraordinary example of Hungarian art nouveau architecture.
- The Holocaust monument complex in Belzec in southeastern Poland.
- The Holocaust memorial in Plunge, Lithuania, features a profoundly moving installation of massive wooden sculptures by the Jewish wood-carver Jakob Bunkas and his artist friends.

New witness accounts of the Holocaust

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

"To keep alive not only memory but also its voices is a noble undertaking." – Elie Wiesel

The importance of witness accounts to the Holocaust can never be understated. Even as this tragedy was unfolding, the zeal to document and leave behind first-hand accounts was remarkable.

The Diary of Anne Frank, of course, is the most famous example of this.

In the introduction to Shards of Memory: Narratives of Holocaust Survival, editor Yehudi Lindeman relates how Simon Dubnov, an elderly Jewish historian, on being led to his execution in Latvia in 1941, exhorted his fellow Jews to schreibt un farschreibt (write it down and record it).

Much of the history of the Warsaw Ghetto comes to us from the Oneg Shabbat archive, the work of a circle of amateur historians determined to leave behind their story.

Recognizing that time was gradually taking its toll on living accounts, director Steven Spielberg set up the Survivors of the Shoah project, which recorded survivors' testimonies.

Other similar projects also exist. Among them are the USC Shoah Foundation Institute and Lindeman's Living Testimony Video Archive at McGill University.

The 25 stories in Shards of Memory are compiled from interviews from the McGill archives. In addition to Jewish survivor accounts, they include an account from a Sinti (Gypsy) survivor and one from a Danish rescuer.

Rather than transfer their oral testimony directly to print, the editors chose to tell their stories as third-person "ghost-written" narratives, which brings them closer to conventional historical narratives.

The editors strived to tell each survivor's story chronologically, giving them a "narrative trajectory" that covers prewar life, the Nazi period and post-liberation experiences.

The editors acknowledge that a task such as this one was not without its challenges. Documenting what Wiesel calls the "unbridgeable gulf between the survivor's memory and its reflection in words" is an onerous task, but one that needed to be done.

Shards of Memory shows how each survivor's story is unique – yet the reader gets the sense that one common thread seems to appear in each account: bravery.

Many of the survivors relate the cunning it took to stay one step ahead of their murderous pursuers. Whether escaping before the occupation, escaping from transit trains, from ghettos and even from camps, each one survived using only his or her wit, courage and sheer bravado in the face of annihilation.

Like Anne Frank, Petr Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy living in Prague during the war years, dutifully kept a diary of his experiences under Nazi occupation.

Petr was a young prodigy – a gifted storyteller and artist (one of his sketches was taken aboard the ill-fated space shuttle Columbia in 2003 by Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon). He undoubtedly would have become a great writer had he survived.

The Diary of Petr Ginz 1941-1942 was written before he was deported to Theresienstadt, where he would become the driving force behind the secret newspaper Vedem. This collection was edited by his sister Chava Pressburger, who last saw Petr in Thereisenstadt as he was shipped to Auschwitz, where he died in 1944, aged 16.

Like Anne Frank, Petr tries hard to keep a semblance of normal life despite the prospect of deportation hanging over him like a Damocles' sword.

He was a mischievous, fun-loving boy with a keen sense of humour. On Sept. 19, 1941, the day after Czech Jews were forced to wear yellow stars, he wrote: "The weather is foggy. Jews were told to wear a badge. When I went to school, I counted 69 sheriffs. Mummy counted more than a hundred."

This book includes some of Petr's writings from Theresienstadt, including an excerpt from his unfinished novel The Secret of Satan's Ghetto, and some of his remarkable drawings.

Both these books are welcome additions to the canon of Holocaust literature.

Observant Jew survives Minneapolis bridge collapse

By JEREMY BRENINGSTALL

Special to The CJN

MINNEAPOLIS — A 20-year-old Torah Academy alumnus from Plymouth, Minn., who is trying to save a friend's life from cancer came face to face with his own life-threatening experience Aug. 1 during the I-35W bridge collapse in the Mississippi River.

Fortunately, he survived to tell the tale with only a few minor injuries.

At least eight people were killed in the Minneapolis bridge collapse and several dozen were injured.

Roman Koyrakh, whose family immigrated to the United States from Russia 18 years ago, was driving northbound in bumper-to-bumper traffic on his way to pick up his father from work on Aug. 1.

He had almost made it across the now infamous bridge when things suddenly began to "shift sideways" and he felt himself falling. For a moment, time seemed to stand still. Koyrakh said the Shema came into his head and he thought he was about to die.

The air bag popped open as his father's green Subaru Outback station wagon hit the water of the Mississippi River upside down. Water began to pour into the car, but Koyrakh realized he was still alive.

"This is when I finally had my moment of panic," Koyrakh said, recalling the incident in a phone interview.

He reached down to unfasten his seatbelt, pushed his car door against the current; exited the vehicle and pulled himself up through the water and onto a girder, a green support beam that was part of the wreckage.

> The first thing he saw was an SUV above his head

The first thing he saw was an SUV above his head, held in place by the girder. An injured woman was in the car.

"Are you OK?" Koyrakh recalls asking. She was conscious, but Koyrakh, fearing that he would make her injuries worse, decided it would be best to await for professional help to arrive.

He then heard two people calling from a red and a silver car floating in the river, the same one later depicted in many news photos. By now the river was full of voices, but he couldn't hear what they were saying.

He jumped into the river and swam toward them. He began to feel shooting pains in his leg. He saw that their condition appeared stable and other people were arriving at the scene, so he returned to the shore.

At that point, given his own physical condition, "I realized there was nothing I could do," Koyrakh said.

Walking up the street dazed and feeling very lucky, he said the Shema again. He borrowed a phone and called his parents to let them know he was all right.

Koyrakh was later taken by ambulance to an area hospital, where he received stitches on his face.

During a talk at Bais Yisroel in St. Louis Park, Minn., on a Shabbat since the bridge collapse, Rabbi Moshe Tuvia Lieff noted that Koyrakh's life was saved at a time when he had been working to help a friend finance surgery to assist in his battle against bone cancer.

While Koyrakh had to face a momentary danger, he said his own situation doesn't compare to his friend's, who is fighting for his life every day.

Lorne Rubenstein - Canada's premiere golf writer

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Globe and Mail's seasoned golf columnist, Lorne Rubenstein, was stunned to hear last winter that he would be inducted into the Canadian Golf Hall of Fame.

"It was unexpected," he said. "I had no idea I was under consideration. It never entered my mind."

Observers of the game, however, were hardly surprised.

Rubenstein, 59, is Canada's pre-eminent golf writer, having been the founding editor of ScoreGolf magazine, a Globe and Mail freelancer for the past 27 years, a contributor to major Canadian and American periodicals and the author and co-author of nearly a dozen books.

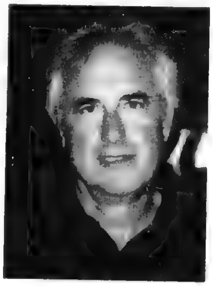
"I'm pleased that the Royal Canadian Golf Association – the governing body of golf in Canada and the operator of the hall of fame– considered me worthy," said Rubenstein, who was officially inducted, along with amateur champion Mary Ann Lapointe, this past June in a ceremony at Maple Downs Golf and Country Club in Maple, Ont.

With his induction, Rubenstein came full circle. His first job in golf, in 1976, was as curator of the RCGA's library, museum and hall of fame at the Glen Abbey Golf Club in Oakville, Ont.

To the best of his knowledge, he is the first Jewish-born writer, and only the second journalist, to be named to the hall of fame. Dick Grimm, a convert to Judaism, and the late Ralph Reville, an early 20th century editor, preceded him.

To Rubenstein, his selection clearly means that the RCGA recognizes the need for fair commentary in golf.

The current editor of ScoreGolf, Bob Weeks, who nominated Rubenstein, said that his colleague and friend is a model writer noted for his insightful, comprehensive and balanced columns and stories.



Lorne Rubenstein

As he put it at a banquet on the day Rubenstein was inducted into the hall of fame, "Lorne's writing is invigorating to read. You never get a tired story full of jargon or puff or cliches. You get a story that is genuinely crafted and wisely thought out, never slapped together."

Rubenstein, whose role model is the late American sports writer Herbert Warren Wind, never imagined that his life's work would revolve around golf.

Although he started playing at the age of 11, and was a caddy and a competitive golfer shortly afterward, he seemed destined for a career in academia.

"I just fell into golf," he said in an interview earlier this month after returning from a tournament in Britain.

Born and raised in Toronto, Rubenstein is a reasonably good golfer who has won a number of tournaments, notably the Hulbert Memorial Pro-Junior in 1964, the Eastern Ontario Amateur in 1972 and the Golf Writers Association of America championship in 1984.

In 1985, he was a member of Canada's Maccabiah Games team, which placed third.

Rubenstein's father, Percy, a professional football player for the Winnipeg Blue Bombers in the 1940s and later the owner of an automotive supply store, introduced him to golf at the Don Valley course. "It kind of went from there."

Rubenstein was drawn to the introspective aspects of the game, and as an avid reader who still likes to frequent libraries whenever possible, he immersed himself in its rich literature and lore.

As a boy, he studied at Talmud Torah and Associated, and while completing an undergraduate degree at York University where he wrote a paper on the psychology of golf, he caddied for Bob Dickson, a United States and British Amateur winner.

In 1972, he spent six weeks as a volunteer on a seaside kibbutz next to Israel's only golf course in Caesarea.

Returning to Canada, Rubenstein finished an master's degree in psychology at the University of Guelph. "My plan was to complete a doctorate at York University," he said.

But then, thanks to a friend's tip, he applied for a position at the Canadian Golf Hall of Fame, where he organized its memorabilia. "That got me into golf." While working there, he began writing for the Canadian Open program.

In 1979, after having caddied for two-time Canadian Amateur champion Jim Nelford, he published his first magazine piece, The Psychology of the Swing, in Toronto. "I never actually sat down and decided to to be a golf writer."

It just happened.

While caddying for Nelford, Rubenstein asked Cec Jennings, the sports editor of the Globe and Mail, whether he would be interested in a story about golf from a caddy's point of view. Since then, Rubenstein has churned out more than 2,500 columns and stories and covered about 400 to 500 tournaments.

Rubenstein was never interested in becoming a member of the Globe's staff. "It has worked out well as it is. I've always enjoyed my freedom."

As a columnist, he has travelled widely, sometimes with his wife Nell Waldman, a retired community college English teacher whom he married in 1992. "Golf has been a passport to the world for me."

One of his hardest-hitting columns, published on Feb. 16, 1989, turned on prejudice. Ken Fulton, the head pro at the Scarboro Golf and Country Club, had just been hired by the Oakdale Golf and Country Club, whose membership is mainly Jewish. At a dinner in Fulton's honour, some stereotypical comments about Jews were made. In disgust, Rubenstein left and proceeded to file a column in which he noted that there is "a thin line between satire and bigotry."

Apart from the Globe and ScoreGolf, he writes or has written for Golf Illustrated, Golf World, Golf Digest, Toronto Life and Maclean's. On the Internet, he contributes to Golf Observer.com.

He has appeared frequently on the Golf Channel, and until two years ago, co-hosted the Acura World of Golf.

A relatively prolific author, Rubenstein's books range from Seasons in a Golfer's Life (with Jim Nelford) and A Season in Dornoch to Mike Weir: The Road to the Masters and A Disorderly Compendium of Golf (with Jeff Neuman), his latest.

Not surprisingly, he is on friendly terms with some of the greats, including Mike Weir, Jack Nicklaus, Tom Watson, Nick Price and David Leadbetter.

A member of five golf clubs in Ontario, Scotland and Ireland, he spends winters at his home in Jupiter, Fla., with his wife. "We've been going down there for many years, and we're very lucky we can do that."

The death of Yiddish

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

I first came across the work of Michael Chabon seven years ago when I saw Wonder Boys, the film adaptation of his 1995 novel of the same name. At the time, I thought the story and its protagonist were thinly veiled reworkings of Philip Roth's recurring Nathan Zuckerman. Zuckerman and Wonder Boys' Grady Tripp, both neurotic, sex- and drug-addicted novelists, are the sort of characters, I suspect, that most writers swear they'll never turn into, but in some very dark spot, fantasize they might be able to actually pull off.

Chabon is best known for his Pulitzer Prize-winning The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay (2000), a historical novel about the two young Jews, Sammy Clay and Joe Kavalier, who built a comic book empire in the late 1930s. His new novel, The Yiddish Policemen's Union, by contrast, takes place outside history. In fact, starting from two real events – the Holocaust and the 1948 establishment of Israel – the story veers off into an entirely new vision of the past 60 years of Jewish history.

As Chabon imagines it, after the fall of Israel in 1948 (he leaves that unexplained), the United States offered Jewish refugees of Europe a federal district to call their own in Alaska. (Chabon grabs another piece of real history here: then-U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt proposed just such an idea in the late 1930s.) The fictional district of Sitka, Alaska, has been home to transplanted European Jews for the last 60 years. All types of Jews – Chassidim, Zionists, enlightened and unaffiliated atheists live in Sitka, where the presiding language and culture is Yiddish – just what you'd expect if European Jewry had never crossed the ocean.

The novel is a tribute to 1940s noir crime capers: Meyer Landsman, the depressed, alcoholic homicide detective, and Berko Shemets, his straight-guy sidekick, stumble through the Sitka underworld to solve the murder of a strung-out heroin addict who, it turns out, is the brilliant son of the Verbover Rebbe, head of a fictional sect of crooked Chassidim.

They battle a police bureaucracy that insists on ignoring the file and uncover a joint U.S.-Verbov plan to incite an Arab civil war in the former Israel (the first step in a scheme to reclaim Israel for the Jews). The story is well done and the characters are true to their genre.

But the novel's real kick is the wild image of European Jews and their offspring living in Alaska, speaking Yiddish in the year 2007. It's unthinkable, and, yet, so easily imagined.

Writing in the current issue of Commentary, Ruth R. Wisse, a distinguished Harvard University professor of Yiddish literature, argues that Chabon reinforces old stereotypes of the European Jew, who is a "harmless refugee… unless and until he fatally conspires to resettle the land of Israel." She also takes aim at Chabon's "sophomoric" Yiddishisms: "Chabon's japes are geared to those who know… as little as he does about European Jewry and its historic language."

Wisse nails Chabon perfectly, but she misses the point. The Yiddish in-jokes in The Yiddish Policemen's Union are indeed juvenile: when one of the novel's characters tells a second to "go take a shitt in the lake," younger, westernized Jews can appreciate the reference. But, when it comes to the difference between calling a Sitka neighbourhood Shvartsn Yam or Shvartser Yam, (Chabon uses the former, while Wisse contends the latter is linguistically correct), the same crowd – the crowd that will read this novel – couldn't care less.

For better or worse, Chabon's version is the future of Yiddish language and culture. European-style Jewry is dying – that way of life hasn't been a reality for 60 years (except in some small circles), and most of the people who lived it are dead.

For Wisse and some children of Holocaust survivors, that doesn't sit well. For everyone else, Chabon's cheeky, imperfect Yiddish will suffice. The jokes and personalities will live on, but the rest will be gone and probably forgotten soon enough.

COCONUT CRUSTED SALMON W/CARIBBEAN SALSA

1 1/4 cups shredded, unsweetened coconut
4 x 6 oz salmon filets, skin removed
Salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 375°F. Put coconut into a freezer bag. Drop in the salmon filets one at a time and toss to coat. Place on a lightly oiled baking sheet and season with salt and pepper. Bake 15 min. Serve with Caribbean Salsa.

Salsa: 2 cups fresh pineapple, cut into small chunks
1 small red onion, diced
1 cup fresh cilantro, minced
1/4 cup of extra virgin olive oil
Zest & juice of 1 lime

Put pineapple, red onion and cilantro into a medium-sized bowl. Add lime zest, juice & oil. Toss well; let flavours mingle at least 1/2 hr. before serving.

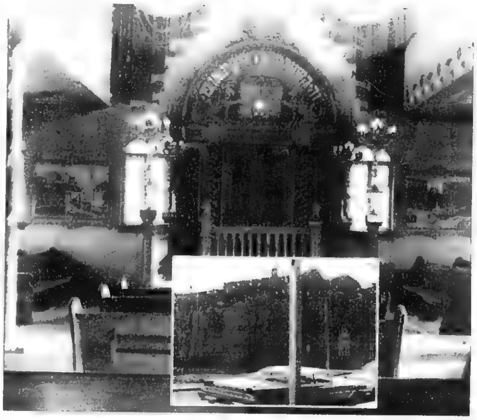
BERKELEY STREET SYNAGOGUE

By BILL GLADSTONE



"This is the gate of God, the Righteous shall enter through it," reads the Hebrew inscription from the Hallel prayer (Psalm 118) above the holy ark in the former Berkeley Street Synagogue, south of Queen Street in east-end Toronto. The congregation started in a house on the street and built the shul during World War I. It opened in 1918. As seen in these 1950s-era photographs, a Talmud Torah was later added in back. Eventually, most Jews disappeared from the neighbourhood and the synagogue – officially known as B'nai Israel Hamizrachim, or the Eastern Children of Israel – was bulldozed to make way for the Moss Park housing project.

Teaching our kids through Harry Potter

By RICHARD S. GELLER
Heritage Florida Jewish News

Guest Voice

I read to my kids almost every night. When Hannah reached first grade, tired of Dr. Seuss, we began reading Harry Potter and the Philosopher's Stone. The story hooked us instantly into a world of witches, wizards, and "Muggles" (non-magical people). By the end of first grade, Hannah had developed such a love of reading, that she was devouring thousands of pages by herself. Like millions of other children, thanks to Harry Potter, reading remains one of Hannah's passions.

A decade after Harry Potter first appeared, many agree that J.K. Rowling has created one of the most enduring works in English literature. The stories are imaginative, complex and entertaining even to adults. The main characters resonate with our children because they seem like normal kids, who develop deep friendships, find courage in their shared adventures and seek a sense of belonging.

On the evil side, Rowling taps into the history of Nazi Germany. She divided the magical world into "pure-bloods" (no Muggles in the bloodline), "half-bloods" (one magical parent and one Muggle parent), and, to underscore the nonsense of it all, children born with magical abilities, but with no magical lineage whatsoever.

The series' heroine, Hermione, born to Muggles, is the Hogwarts School's hardest-working and most talented student. However, that doesn't stop her and Harry's "pure-blood" nemesis, the bigoted Draco Malfoy, from taunting her as a "mudblood."

Rowling also created a Hitler-like antagonist, Voldemort, who rallies his SS-like "Death Eaters" on notions of preserving their "pure-blood" heritage. Draco, who eventually joins the Death Eaters, threatens of the coming genocide in Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire, "I warned you!… They'll be the first to go, now the Dark Lord's back! mudbloods and Muggle-lovers first!"

Hitler entered into alliances with "non-Aryans," including Soviet Russia (temporarily), imperial Japan and the Arab mufti of Jerusalem. To gain power, Voldemort similarly allies himself with those bearing no resemblance to the "pure-blood" ideal, including a werewolf, giants and ghoulish cloaked monsters known as "Dementors." Ironically, Voldemort himself is a half-blood, born to a Muggle father.

Reminiscent of Hitler's "1,000-year Reich," Voldemort seeks to remain in power forever, by using a dark magical spell to achieve immortality. In the Harry Potter movies, actor Ralph Fiennes, the sadistic camp commander of Schindler's List, is perfectly cast as Voldemort.

The latest film and fifth book, Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix, presents a naive government known as the "Ministry of Magic," which refuses to believe Harry's eyewitness account of Voldemort's return. Harry reminds one of early death camp escapees, disbelieved by those in power, by the press and even by soon-to-be victims. Harry is mocked, playing the role of Moshe the Beadle, who escaped the Nazis and warned the villagers at the beginning of Elie Wiesel's autobiography, Night.

Dumbledore, headmaster of Hogwarts, who does believe Harry, is reminiscent of British prime minister Winston Churchill's lone voice in the 1930s warning of Hitler. Rowling creates uncanny parallels to 1930s European leaders, who would not believe Hitler's true intentions and capabilities. Harry himself is an average wizard, with average grades, humble, and yet, out of love for his friends and vengeance for his parents' murders, finds courage to fight Voldemort despite bleak odds. Harry is not unlike the orphans who rose against the Nazis in the Warsaw ghetto.

Hannah just turned eight, and wanting to shelter her from our cruel history, I haven't had the heart to teach her about what happened to her eastern European relatives, left behind by her great-grandparents who immigrated to America. When the time comes to teach her about the deathly Holocaust, J.K. Rowling will have made my burden easier.

Israel to aid Holocaust survivors

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a meeting with representatives of Holocaust survivors, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed to allocate NIS 100 million (about $25.2 million Cdn) next year for medical and nursing-care benefits to survivors living in Israel.

In addition, he said the survivors would enjoy municipal tax discounts, an exemption from the television tax and NIS 30 million ($7.56 million) in vacation and convalescence benefits.

The meeting with representatives of the Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors was held this past Sunday, the deadline set by Olmert for settling the demands of Holocaust survivors who had protested a government plan to grant them just $20 a month in subsidies.

Government will allocate about $25.2 million (Cdn)

The funds allotted for convalescence and for medical and nursing-care benefits, which will be distributed by the Holocaust Survivors' Welfare Fund, will double in 2009.

Olmert refused, however, to grant benefits to survivors who fled Nazi-controlled territory and were not placed in concentration camps or ghettos, saying that to do so would be to create an "ethnic gap" between European Holocaust survivors and elderly Israelis who fled persecution in other countries, such as Iraq.

"I don't doubt for even one moment the distress of those who fled from countries where the Nazis were, and they are survivors of the Nazi occupation," Olmert said, adding, however, that "I am not disregarding those who fled from the enemies of Israel – the Persians, the Moroccans, the Tunisians and the Syrians."

Noah Flug, who heads the Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors in Israel, told Olmert that two-thirds of Holocaust survivors from Poland managed to flee eastward during the Nazi occupation. He said most international groups and foreign governments – and previously, the Israeli government – have recognized such refugees as survivors in every way.

The government negotiators were initially considering granting benefits to those who fled Nazi-controlled territory, but changed their position in face of opposition from the Finance Ministry's budget division.

The ministry said financial problems relating to such survivors should instead be resolved within the context of a solution for all needy elderly Israelis. The National Economics Council is due to come up with such a solution by mid-September.

The Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors is aiming to D'oh! Simpsons writer saves the day

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

The world is coming to an end, and someone must save the day. Will it be Superman, Batman, X-Man or the Fantastic Four?

No, it's Homer Simpson to the rescue. D'oh? Well, don't be surprised – Homer created the problem. Now, that's not surprising.

"Homer has slipped up a couple of times," says Joel Cohen, a senior writer and a co-executive producer for The Simpsons.

Look at the mess Homer gets himself into in the newly released The Simpsons Movie, created by a team of writers that includes Cohen.

When Homer's pet pig's droppings, kept in a leaky silo, turn the townspeople into an angry mob, he's forced to leave Springfield with his wife, Marge, and his children, Bart, Lisa and Maggie. More trouble's on the way as President Schwarzenegger gets the Environmental Protection Agency involved. Homer is left to fend for himself, embarking on a personal journey to right the wrongs.

Cohen, 39, originally from Calgary, says the movie took four years to make. because "the animation process takes a long time, and there's lots of writing.

"First there were 11 writers, later others from the show joined on," he adds.

The same holds true for the hit television series The Simpsons, which recently celebrated its 400th show and 18th season.

City Honours Mirvish

TORONTO — Mayor David Miller declared Aug. 12 Ed Mirvish Day in Toronto as crowds thronged the streets outside the late entrepreneur's Honest Ed's store for to celebrate his life. Among those joining Miller at the tribute, which featured free entertainment and hot dogs, were Mirvish's wife Anne and son David, as well as Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty and former Ontario lieutenant-governor Lincoln Alexander. Mirvish died July 11 at 92.

Wiesel Speaks

CALGARY — Lawyers must guard against apathy in the face of evil and beware the justice system being corrupted to support injustice, Nobel laureate, author and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel told a legal convention in Calgary last week. Wiesel gave the keynote address Aug. 12 at the opening of the Canadian Bar Association's annual conference. Noting that many lawyers stood by as Hitler made plans to kill Europe's Jews, he cautioned against being indifferent to current injustices at home and globally.

WORLD

Prof In Tenure Fight

NEW YORK — More than 800 people signed a petition to deny tenure to a Barnard College professor accused of being anti-Israel. Nadia Abu El-Haj, an assistant professor of anthropology, wrote a book, Facts on the Ground, that attacks Israeli archeology, arguing it produces knowledge to support Israel's foundational myths and is thus complicit in state "crimes" against Palestinians. Paula Stern, a 1982 Barnard graduate who started the petition, says El-Haj's scholarship is shoddy and her claims unsupported.

Birthright Gets Gift

JERUSALEM — The Adelson Family Charitable Foundation donated some $30 million (US) to birthright israel for next year's trips. The gift brings the total pledged to birthright by the foundation to nearly $60 million. The latest gift will help end long waiting lists that have resulted from birthright's popularity. In February, the foundation gave $25 million to birthright, allowing for twice as many trips to Israel this summer by Jews 18 to 26. Some 32,000 applications, a record, were received from North America for some 19,000 spaces this summer. Miriam and Sheldon Adelson gave $5 million to birthright in December, enabling those on the waiting list to go on winter trips. Birthright israel honoured the Adelsons Aug. 12 in Jerusalem.

Assailant Apologizes

SAN FRANCISCO — The man who accosted Elie Wiesel in a San Francisco hotel apologized last week in court. Wiesel, a Shoah survivor and Nobel laureate, was on the witness stand recounting what he called his most harrowing ordeal since World War II when Eric Hunt blurted out, "I'm terribly sorry about what happened." Wiesel said he wasn't sure the apology by Hunt, 23, of New Jersey, was sincere. "I expected it," Wiesel said. "I'm a novelist. I imagine situations. This is something a character would do. It's clever, very clever." Hunt admitted he travelled 3,000 miles to California to get Wiesel to admit the Shoah didn't occur. He's charged with six felonies, including attempted kidnapping, battery and stalking, in connection with the Feb. 1 incident, when he approached Wiesel in an elevator at a conference. Hunt was arrested three weeks later after posting an account of the incident on an anti-Semitic website.

War Criminal Denied Bail

VANCOUVER — Convicted Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert was denied bail last week as he seeks to appeal a ruling earlier this month to have him extradited to Italy, where he faces a life sentence.

B.C. Court of Appeal Judge Jo-Ann Prowse said public confidence in the justice system would be undermined if he were freed while seeking leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Prowse said he's unlikely to succeed, because his grounds for appeal are "frivolous" or "weak."

On Aug. 3, the B.C. Court of Appeal upheld a ruling that Seifert, 83, be extradited for killings he committed in 1944 and 1945, during World War II.

In 2000, Seifert, who once worked in a B.C. lumber mill and lives in East Vancouver, was convicted in absentia by an Italian military court for the rape, torture and murder of nine people at a Nazi concentration transit camp near the Italian town of Bolzano, where he served as an SS prison guard. Italian courts upheld the ruling, and he's been fighting extradition since his arrest here in 2002.

Seifert, who came to Canada in 1951 and became a citizen, was said to be so cruel that he was dubbed the "Beast of Bolzano." The Ukrainian-born Seifert admits to being at the camp, but denies taking part in the killings.

If his appeal is denied, Seifert could be extradited quickly, as he would be out of legal options.

Torontonians help beleaguered Israeli city

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Yehoshua Weber and members of Clanton Park Synagogue raised $36,000 this summer for a transportable bomb shelter so that they could help residents of Sderot in a concrete way.

The beleaguered Israeli city is using the shelter outside a day-care centre run by Re'ut (a non-profit organization that serves social and educational needs). The town has been subject to Qassam rocket attacks from nearby Gaza for seven years, and the attacks were stepped up this spring.

Operation Lifeshield, the organization that provided the shelter, honoured the rabbi and the synagogue, which has about 230 member families, at a dedication ceremony in Sderot last month.

In a test run, the children were able to get from the outdoor play area into the shelter in less than 15 seconds, according to information from Operation Lifeshield.

Morris Sosnovitch, who chaired the shul's six-week fundraising campaign following a Shabbat sermon by the rabbi on the need to help, said he thinks the idea struck a chord. "We could actually make a difference in people's lives," said Sosnovitch, who was in Sderot two years ago for his nephew's wedding. "We could save lives in the event of an attack, and I think that really spoke to people."

From left, Shmuel Bowman of Operation Lifeshield, Yechiel Colman and Rabbi Yehoshua Weber, both from Clanton Park Synagogue, hold a plaque at the dedication of a new transportable bomb shelter in Sderot, Israel.

At the dedication, which took place in front of the children's centre, congregants Yechiel Colman, and Bobby and Sharon Silberstein and their children joined the rabbi. The shelter was dedicated in memory of the synagogue's founders.

Colman said Sderot was quiet the day of the dedication and "absolutely beautiful. It's a small town, with very nice-looking homes from the outside, a commercial centre, a residential area, shops."

He was enthusiastic about the donation, noting that the shelter could be on site within two days of the organization's receiving funds. He also said he would urge other synagogues to contribute funds for such shelters, but he was critical of the Israeli government, which, he said, "has not properly stepped up to the plate.

"It is essential in my view that the government of Israel take positive steps to prevent the Qassams coming over in the first place. Can you imagine if the FLQ became more active and started sending missiles into Ottawa or any Ontario town?

"Providing these shelters, while commendable, is not a long-term solution."

Colman noted that for about half the price of the shelter, the organization offers bus shelters "that provide a great deal of protection. You don't have that many seconds after the warning goes off."

Other organizations have also made Sderot a priority. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto donated $1 million in emergency funds earlier this year, and it has raised $180,000 for Sderot youth in an ongoing campaign to collect further funds. "It is an important priority," said federation spokesperson Howard English.

The Reform movement and the Orthodox Union (OU) have also launched fundraising campaigns for the Negev town.

The Canadian Reform movement has donated "quite a bit" to the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism – the Israeli Reform movement – for its emergency relief efforts, said Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism & ARZA Canada. Last fall, her office sent $75,000 to help rebuild northern Israel after the Lebanon war last summer.

Jerusalem, endless enigma

From the editor's desk

It is not clear whether the 40th anniversary earlier this summer of the reunification of Jerusalem had an impact on the findings of the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies' (JIIS) annual poll regarding the place and importance of Jerusalem as a factor in the strength of State of Israel and the image of the city in the eyes of the Jewish public.

The findings, however, were unequivocal.

- A clear majority of the Jewish public (92 per cent in 2007, 95 per cent in 2006) believe that it is important or very important to maintain a large Jewish majority in Jerusalem.
- An equally impressive 81 per cent of the Jewish public (up from 77 per cent in 2006) believe that Jerusalem with a clear Jewish majority contributes to the national strength of the State of Israel;
- But 54 per cent of Jerusalemites felt the capital is more and more a city of the haredim, as compared to 65 per cent of the rest of the residents of Israel who felt that way.

Last week, the institute released the findings of a companion poll, of sorts, concerning Jerusalem that are a bit difficult to reconcile with the results of the earlier poll.

As reported in Ha'aretz, the study dealt with projections of the city's future demographics in order to make determinations about the types of local community councils that would promote the best local governance in the city.

The study was funded by the Association of Community Centres, which is a strong proponent of the notion that the city works best when citizens are given the opportunity to become involved in local councils to find solutions to unique local problems. Preferably, the local councils should reflect the composition and concerns of the people who live in the area.

Setting aside the report's conclusions regarding the optimum configuration of local community councils that will correlate best to the city's demographics, it is the substance of those as-yet-unkown demographics that draws our immediate attention.

Ha'aretz described the study as providing "a glimpse into the future of Jerusalem neighbourhoods."

"According to the study's authors, most people in the capital are not Zionists; they are either Arab or ultra-Orthodox. Furthermore, for the first time, there are signs that the city's secular middle class is moving to the suburbs.

The study points out that the rapid growth of the haredi population is pushing the ultra-Orthodox communities into secular neighbourhoods of the city."

As well, "since the construction of the separation fence, some Arab families have moved into Jewish neighbourhoods, particularly in the northern parts of the city where rents are relatively low."

Thus, it may indeed be true that a vast majority of Israel's Jews want Jerusalem to retain its strong Jewish majority. However, it is likely equally as true that Jerusalem's Jewish majority is evolving into a haredi one.

For a number of reasons, including financial, economic, social and educational, secular and even sizable numbers of modern Orthodox Jews are leaving the city for outside Jerusalem, albeit neighbouring communities.

Are we witnessing a character transformation of Israel's capital? Are the city's many famous diverse neighbourhoods headed to a kind of socio-religious homogeneity that will mark the end of their distinctiveness?

It is difficult to look to Jerusalem's recent past for any certainty about its demographic future. Much like the mysterious metaphysics and sometimes otherworldliness of the city, its future, quite obviously, is still an enigma.

By contrast, however, the city's past has been one of the most chronicled of any city on earth. For a superb elucidation of Jerusalem's recent past, I recommend Beyond the Wall: Chapters on Urban Jerusalem by Heike Zaun-Goshen.

Zaun-Goshen, a writer and translator who lives in the Jerusalem area, walks with the reader through some the city's delightful, interesting and wonderfully eccentric neighbourhoods, each its own community of characters and character.

Her work does not generally delve further back than the last century and a half when, as the author points out, Jerusalemites began to move "beyond the wall." Urban changes were set in motion that would result in Jerusalem developing "from a sleepy, provincial one-horse town somewhere in the Turkish empire into today's complex modern city."

Well-researched and rich in detail, the book is aimed primarily at the lay reader. Its language is smooth and inviting. The history it tells is always informative and thought-provoking. The book also has the added benefit of a one-page foreword written by Teddy Kollek. It was probably one of the very last messages on Jerusalem written by the late mayor before he passed away.

Anyone familiar with the streets and the neighbourhoods of Jerusalem will delight at the opportunity Zaun-Goshen provides us to learn about their origins and their engaging idiosyncrasies.

This column will be written next week in Jerusalem. – MBD

Jewish day school fees on the rise — again

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Students and parents at Toronto Jewish day schools may be starting to face back-to-school anxiety – students over the end of summer, and parents about lighter wallets.

Seymour Epstein

That's because Labour Day is just around the corner and tuition fees for grades 1 through 8 at Toronto's seven largest day schools have increased between three and eight per cent from 2006-07 to 2007-08, similar to last year's increases of four to eight per cent.

At the same schools, tuition for preschool and nursery school increased between three and 19 per cent.

The increases are once again higher than the annualized rate of inflation, which in June, the latest month for which data is available from the Bank of Canada, was 2.2 per cent.

Associated Hebrew Day Schools raised its fees for half-day nursery, junior and senior kindergarten by six per cent, from $4,825 to $5,100, and its full-day fees for the same grades by three per cent, from $9,650 to $9,950.

Tuition for grades 1 through 6 rose four per cent, from $10,250 to $10,700, and five per cent for grades 7 and 8, from $10,450 to $10,950.

Bialik Hebrew Day School saw a uniform increase of three per cent in fees for its half-day junior and senior kindergarten programs, as well as full-day kindergarten and grade 1 through 8.

In the 2006-07 school year, half-day enrolment cost $5,500, and this year costs $5,662.50. These fees are exactly half of the full-day fee, which was $11,000 last year and $11,325 this year. The fees include a $1,025 building fund payment, which has remained unchanged since last year.

Eitz Chaim Day School raised tuition by five per cent in grades 1 through 8, from $10,400 to $10,900. Half-day nursery school fees climbed five per cent as well, from last year's $2,900 to this year's $3,050. Full-day nursery school costs four per cent more at $3,800, up from $3,650.

Junior kindergarten at Eitz Chaim showed the largest tuition fee increase out of all the schools, jumping 19 per cent for half-day enrolment, from $2,900 to $3,450, and 17 per cent for full-day enrolment, at $4,200, up from $3,600 last year. Full-day senior kindergarten fees rose four per cent for the 2007-2008 school year, from last year's $6,950 to this year's $7,250.

Tuition at Leo Baeck Day School rose by six per cent for both the half-day nursery and junior kindergarten programs (to $5,225, up from $4,950) and for full-day senior kindergarten and grades 1 through 8 (to $10,450 from $9,990).

Parents of toddlers at Netivot HaTorah Day School's half-day nursery school will pay eight per cent more than last year, $3,125 instead of $2,900. Full-day nursery school costs seven per cent more at $8,140, compared to 2006-07's $7,635.

Half-day junior and senior kindergarten tuition is $5,570 this year, up eight per cent from last year's $5,160. Full-day kindergarten fees also rose eight per cent, from $9,805 to $10,585.

Grades 1 to 3 at Netivot HaTorah cost $11,310, eight per cent higher than last year's $10,480. Tuition fees for grades 4 through 8 also increased by eight per cent, from $10,680 to $11,540.

Netivot HaTorah is introducing an extended nursery program this year that runs until 2 p.m. It costs $5,633.

Tuition at the Toronto Heschel School rose five per cent for full-day junior kindergarten, from $9,300 to $9,800.

All other tuition fees increased by six per cent. Half-day junior kindergarten climbed from $5,300 to $5,600; senior kindergarten to grade 3 now costs $13,800, up from last year's $13,000; grades 4 to 5 is $14,000 this year, up from last year's $13,200; and grades 6 to 8 costs $14,300, up from $13,500.

The United Synagogue Day School increased nursery school tuition fees by 12 per cent, from $4,400 last year to $4,950 this year. Half-day preschool and full-day senior kindergarten both increased six per cent. The former costs $5,500, up from $5,200, and the latter $11,000, up from $10,400.

Tuition for grade 1 is up seven per cent, to $11,400 from $10,700, and fees for grades 2 to 8 are six per cent higher at $11,900, up from $11,200.

Fees were also raised by Toronto's two largest Jewish high schools. The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto made headlines this spring with its 10 per cent increase in tuition fees. Tuition this fall is $17,150, up from $15,650 last year.

Fees at the Bnei Akiva high schools, Ulpanot Orot Girls' School and Yeshivat Or Chaim, are not far behind. The cost of tuition for the 2007-08 year climbed eight per cent from last year, to $16,900 from $15,650.

Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president of Jewish education for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the executive director of the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz) said schools make individual choices based on internal budgets, and the financial strain on families caused by high tuition fees will only be reduced when the provincial government funds Jewish schools.

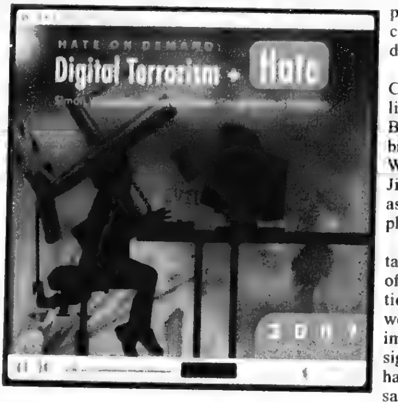
Online hate sites grow again, Wiesenthal report says

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The number of hate and terror-related sites on the Internet has increased to more than 7,000, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center said at the recent release of its annual findings on online racism.

At an Aug. 10 news conference in Vancouver, Leo Adler, the Wiesenthal Center's director of national affairs, noted that the number of hate and terror sites worldwide is up almost 17 per cent – from about 6,000 – since the release of last year's report.

The Center's Digital Terrorism and Hate 2007 CD-ROM – the latest in a series of electronic reports disseminated annually for the past decade to police, governments, educators and parents across Canada – is the result of work by the Wiesenthal Center's international team of researchers, who sifted through more than 25,000 sites to find the offending pages.



Adler called today's Internet climate one that "not only facilitates hate, violence and terrorism, its technological engines shape and even dictates tactics and trends deployed by groups committed to destroying our democratic values and multicultural societies."

He added that terrorist organizations continue to use the Internet to "recruit young people into their culture of death."

This year's CD-ROM highlights two British Columbia websites, BC White Pride and Jihad Unspun, as prime examples of web hate.

It also contains hundreds of samples of articles, videos, web pages and images, all designed to spread hateful messages against Jews, Israel, America and a hodgepodge of other groups.

It also includes two flash movies that trace "the evolution of how hate… groups have manipulated the web to promote their agendas."

Presented in English, French and Spanish, Digital Terrorism and Hate 2007 allows users to search and read up on hate sites by region, strategy, group and a plethora of sub-headings.

The content is overwhelming and often sobering.

Of the 7,000 sites found this year, Adler estimates that 60 per cent are "terrorist related" and focus exclusively on Israel, Jews and the West.

"The overwhelming majority [of sites] have always been anti-Semitic in various forms," he said. "But there are sites that are homophobic, anti-immigrant, anti-Muslim… it's very democratic. Nobody is left out. There's a hate group [for] everybody."

Leo Adler

Just two days after the CD's launch, a tip from the Calgary Police Service alerted the Wiesenthal Center to yet another website, called the "Aryan Guard," after Calgary authorities discovered leaflets advertising the site inside some of the city's free weekly newspapers and posted around town.

The site was registered in July and put on a U.S.-based server by Bill Noble, who is well-known to the Center for his racist views and publications.

Noble is currently awaiting trial in B.C. on charges of wilful promotion of hatred, stemming from an Wiesenthal-filed complaint against him in 2004.

"Noble has begun to re-acquaint himself among global racists… in recent weeks," Adler said. "His new on-line initiatives are cause for great concern and vigilance by Canadians."

Though many hate sites are aimed at Canadians, most are hosted on U.S. servers, which makes it difficult to prosecute their authors due to U.S. First Amendment rights, Adler told The CJN.

But any time a hate site is found on a Canadian server, the Center will contact the server host, and most times the site will be taken down.

Still, the increase in sites worries Adler.

"Twelve years ago, there was only one site. The increase isn't unusual given that the Internet is spreading," he said. "People are becoming more sophisticated in being able to [set up hate sites]. You only need one person… and if he's sophisticated, he can make the site look good, obtain funding, get recruits and put his views across."

Adler said work on the 2008 version has already begun. "We never stop."

School director considers school fees to be low

David Prashker, director of Leo Baeck Day School, said he considers fees at all the Toronto day schools to be low, and added that the schools work very hard to keep them that way.

"We are so conscious of the number of people who want and need and deserve a Jewish education in the community, for whom high prices would simply exclude them. Huge efforts go into keeping tuition down," he said.

"My sense of those increases that have happened is that they are absolutely necessary to provide the core quality education that we are all trying to provide for our children."

Gail Baker, head of school at the Toronto Heschel School, said that "tuition fees are raised due to rising costs and also because our school, like other ones, does not usually turn students away because they can't afford the tuition. The cost of day school education is high and it is our culture to be as inclusive as possible."

Interactive Torah program unique, founder says

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

A new interactive online Torah study program now being offered by Torah in Motion is a global first, says founder and leader Rabbi Jay Kelman.

The program, called e-TiM, for electronic Torah in Motion, features noted speakers and scholars from around the world whose lectures are broadcast live to subscribers via the web.

It's interactive because viewers can use a webcam to ask questions or participate in lectures if they choose to.

"While Internet learning has caught on and there are a number of Jewish organizations [using the Internet], I'm not aware of anyone else where [the program is] two-way interactive and video interactive and you don't have to go anywhere," Rabbi Kelman said.

"You can be in your pyjamas and learn with somebody who is in Israel."

He added: "The technology is amazing. Not only can you see and talk to the speaker, it's better than a live class. You can write questions into the screen. There's total interactivity between you and the speaker and you and the other people."

Torah in Motion is a Toronto-based modern Orthodox learning centre that has been offering lectures, courses and programming since 2001. E-TiM got started in 2006, but is making its grand debut this fall.

The lineup of classes is diverse in terms of both topics and speakers. Examples include two lectures on "The Mitzvah of Shofar: Its Nature and its Purpose" by Rabbi Adam Mintz and Rabbi Dov Linzer; a series on the "architects" of modern Orthodoxy by Rabbi Marc Shapiro; and a Midnight Midrash series starting in late October.

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Last year, Rabbi Kelman said, a variety of students signed up for e-TiM from across the globe, including from Canada, the United States, Israel, Australia and Germany. He hopes the roster will grow this year.

Eventually, Rabbi Kelman also wants to expand the program with lunchtime learning sessions and daily evening sessions. He is also working on having regular Torah in Motion programs broadcast live online.

Currently, only e-TiM classes are broadcast live. Participants can choose to be anonymous or to be actively involved. "Re-runs" can be heard again, but not seen, after the initial broadcast.

Sholom Eisenstat, a computer resource teacher for the York Region District School Board, calls himself the "technical brains" behind the e-TiM operation.

"It's basically a television station… but the interactive stuff is what's really unique here," Eisenstat said of the program.

Reform members shopping in Sderot

This summer her office raised a more modest $3,400, including an anonymous donation of $1,000. She said the campaign is still ongoing and attributed the relatively low amount in part to people being away for the summer and, for some, having already donated to the federation's campaign.

On a trip to Israel in July, Rabbi Sobel, who travels to Israel twice a year, learned that members of a Reform synagogue there were helping in a different way, by travelling to Sderot to do their grocery shopping, thus helping the town's economy and providing moral support. "That, to me, was very moving," she said.

The Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism has hosted Sderot families for a weekend away, organized children's activities in Sderot, packed food parcels for the needy and hosted youngsters from Sderot as well as from kibbutzim on the Gaza border also suffering Qassam attacks at its summer camp.

Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto was among the mostly American Orthodox congregations raising money for the OU's campaign. The synagogue, which raised more than $40,000, has also undertaken other projects for Sderot, including support for a hesder yeshiva there, said synagogue member Larry Zeifman.

Israel's northern front

The first anniversary marking the end of the Second Lebanon War passed quietly on Israel's northern front last week, a year to the day on Aug. 14 that a United Nations Security Council resolution went into effect. Resolution 1701, approved by Israel and Lebanon, ended 34 days of fighting that pitted Israel against Hezbollah, a Shiite Lebanese force supported by Iran and Syria.

Hezbollah, which regards the outcome of the war as a "divine victory," marked the anniversary with a bombastic rally in Beirut during which its spiritual leader, Hassan Nasrallah, told followers that, while he does not seek a second round, Hezbollah is in possession of rockets that can reach any point in Israel. Israeli Infrastructure Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer took his threat seriously. As he put it, "Nasrallah has never lied. He is cocky, he is arrogant, but at least from our experience with him, to my regret, what he has said, he has done." Lest we forget, Hezbollah fired nearly 4,000 Iranian- and Syrian-made rockets at Israeli military bases and population centres, causing civilian casualties and property damage of a calibre that far surpassed Iraq's bombardment of Israel with 39 Scud missiles in the 1991 Gulf War.

As these developments in Lebanon played out, the Golan Heights, captured by Israel from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War, remained tranquil, the ceasefire hammered out by the United States in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War holding firm. With war jitters grating nerves, Israel and Syria sent conciliatory messages to each other. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said, "Israel is not interested in a war with Syria, but we are preparing for any eventuality." Striking a remarkably similar tone, Syria's vice-president, Farouk Shara, declared, "Israel knows that we do not wish for war," but he added that Syria can fall back on what he described as "other options." All things considered, then, a renewal of hostilities between Israel and Hezbollah, on the one hand, and Israel and Syria, on the other, seems unlikely at this moment. But the north remains a tinderbox that may yet explode should there be a miscalculation by either side.

Although Israel's military performance in last summer's war left much to be desired, and emboldened Hezbollah and its allies, Israel emerged with tactical gains. Hezbollah was dislodged from the Israeli border area, forced to deploy to positions north of the Litani River. Lebanese troops finally made their presence felt there for the first time in a generation. And the UN peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon, known as UNIFIL, was beefed up. Since Hezbollah can, therefore, no longer act with impunity, it has refrained from launching attacks on Israel. Viewed from this perspective, the UN truce has been effective. Yet dark clouds loom on the horizon, given that Resolution 1701 has been only partially implemented. Southern Lebanon has not been demilitarized, nor has Hezbollah been disarmed. Iran and Syria continue to replenish Hezbollah's arsenal, according to reports. The two Israeli soldiers abducted by Hezbollah on July 12, 2006, the incident that triggered the war, remain in captivity. When all these factors are considered, along with the recurring tensions that characterize Israel's uneasy relationship with Syria, one can safely say that the seething northern front is still a cause for concern for the Israeli government.

25 years ago in The CJN

PLO forces, crushed during the recent war in Lebanon, gradually left Beirut for havens throughout the Middle East. Meanwhile, Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, the European Economic Community, the United Nations and U.S. officials all said they support diplomatic initiatives to solve the Palestinian question.

Editorial Advisory Board: Michael Brown, Sandra Brown, Donald Carr, Adam Hummel, Zac Kaye, Igor Korenzvit, Hagai Kuperman, Keith Landy, Andrea Most, Lou Ronson, Jacques Sayegh, Mike Shriqui, Pamela Medjuck Stein, Rabbi Michael Stroh, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

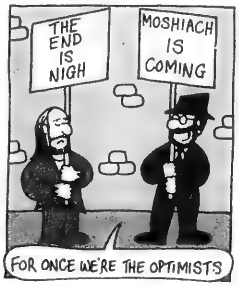
Palestinian goals

The left rejoiced after reports that the political platform of the new Palestinian government did not include the word "resistance," which was the Palestinian code word for terrorism against Israel ("New PA plank omits 'armed struggle,'" CJN, Aug. 2). This development, it was asserted, demonstrates once and for all that the "moderate" government of Palestinian Prime Minister Salem Fayad is a partner Israel can work with. But those claims were quickly deflated by none other than Fayad himself. Speaking to reporters in Cairo, Fayad reaffirmed that Palestinians have the right to use violence against Israel. "Resistance is a legitimate right for the Palestinian people," he said. Plain, simple and clear.



It should be obvious by now, even to the most obtuse leftist ideologue, that the only difference between "moderate" and "extreme" Palestinians is one of style, not substance. Their goals are the same, as are their tactics, and we do ourselves and our future a great disservice when we delude ourselves into thinking otherwise.

Applying 'double standards' to Israel

Naomi Klein appears to be very upset with a comment by Paul Michaels in which he allegedly "denigrated" an op-ed piece by Klein criticizing Israel's defence industry ("Klein responds to Michaels," CJN letter, Aug. 2). The piece appeared in several left-wing papers around the world, including Vancouver's Georgia Straight. Klein's explanation is that it only was a "much-abridged version of a chapter" in her upcoming book, The Shock Doctrine: The Rise Of Disaster Capitalism, describing a "global phenomenon," the growing military industry around the world.

Unfortunately, her excuse is entirely disingenuous. The chapter she chose for her widely distributed article solely dealt in very harsh terms with Israel, to the exclusion of all other countries involved in the trade of weapons, compared to whom Israel is a minor player.

In 2005, the European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia, on behalf of the European Union, drafted a definition of anti-Semitism that states, in part, that "examples of ways in which anti-Semitism manifests itself with regard to the State of Israel, taking in account the overall context could include… applying double standards by requiring of it a behaviour not expected and demanded of any other democratic nation."

Klein has different standard for Israel

I find it curious that Naomi Klein considers it threatening that Israel provides telecommunications equipment to police departments in the United States, but then she has a different standard for Israel than for any other country ("Klein responds to Michaels," CJN letter, Aug. 2).

Klein quotes former U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower's oft-repeated warning about the "military industrial complex." Many years before Eisenhower's warning, the Russian Communist Vladimir Lenin described leftists in the West as "useful idiots."

New interest in Yiddish

In my small, close circle of friends, there is a phenomenon occurring. Where once children of Holocaust survivors may have joined the rest of the crowd and made fun of Yiddish accents, more and more of these same children, who are losing their parents to old age, suddenly hear ourselves inserting Yiddish words here and there more and more often. We even find themselves singing Yiddish songs that our late parents used to sing to us as children. We sing these songs with tears in our eyes. Personally, I found it so very touching when, after my father passed away last October, my 24-year-old daughter went on the Internet and listened to Yiddish songs her zaide sang to her when she was little.

Comment applied to gov't position

The CJN in the article "Federal court denies Jerusalem, Israel, designation" (July 19) states: "In an interview with The CJN, David Matas, Veffer's Winnipeg-based lawyer, called the court's ruling 'facetious and nonsensical.'"

While, in that interview, I did use the phrase "facetious and nonsensical," I applied that phrase to the position of the government, not to the ruling of the court.

Knesset should protect JNF land

Bill would permit gov't to continue current practice

By MORTON A. KLEIN AND IRWIN HOCHBERG

Israel's democratically elected Knesset is right to be pushing forward with a bill reaffirming that all lands belonging to the Jewish National Fund should continue to be leased to Jews in accordance with terms of the organization's charter.

Critics of the measure, which the Knesset recently approved 64 to 16 in the bill's first reading, misconceive the function and purpose of the JNF, a body funded by private donations to purchase and develop land for Jewish settlement. The critics do not seem to understand that JNF land is private land, not state-owned public land.

For more than 100 years, Jews from around the world put their small change and small bills into the well-known blue-and-white JNF boxes in homes, schools and synagogues. Jews understood there was a sacred promise that their money would buy land in Eretz Yisrael for Jews to emigrate there and build a Jewish state in our ancient, biblical homeland where Abraham, Isaac and Jacob lived, and where King David and King Solomon once ruled. This was the contract, the promise, the covenant between JNF and the Jewish people.

During its century-long existence, from the time of Turkish and later British rule, the JNF has been involved in the legal purchase and reclamation of 250,000 acres of largely uninhabited, malaria-ridden swamp lands and desert that no one wanted or could live on. The JNF eliminated disease, rendered the land fit for habitation and agriculture, planted 220 million trees and built many reservoirs.

There is increasing pressure now to lease parts of this private land (constituting about 10 per cent of Israel) to Israeli Arabs, although they already have the right to lease public Israeli state land (about 70 per cent of Israel). Such a step would be wrong. No one would dream of telling private land owners like the Catholic Church or the Muslim Waqf to whom they can lease their land. Moreover, JTA reported on "some cases where Jews attempted to move into non-Jewish neighbourhoods… that have been vigorously protested by non-Jews, saying they should be allowed to maintain ethnically and culturally distinct communities."

JNF is responsible for co-ordinating the planting of all trees in Israel. All JNF forests have large markers that have been carved by a stonemason (seen here). Some are very elaborate and give the name of the forest and the donor. Below: Canada Park.

It seems clear that the JNF contract with Jewish donors must be respected – that's why Israel's democratically elected Knesset voted overwhelmingly to approve the first reading of a bill to reaffirm that all private JNF land continue to be leased to Jews in accordance with the JNF charter.

Additionally, there are many laws, institutions and practices in Israel that we all support that promote and protect the Jewishness of the state, such as immigration laws, Jewish education in schools, the Jewish-starred flag and the national anthem, Hatikvah, which speaks of the Jewish soul.

As Philadelphia's Jewish Exponent editorialized, "The land in question is not mere real estate JNF property is the inheritance of the entire Jewish people." It added that "JNF policies should stand."

In the late 1800s, the Jews rejected settling in Uganda because it lacked any historical or religious connection to Judaism. The Exponent added, "JNF's task is building homes for a nation that has no other haven." Indeed, Holocaust survivors, former Soviet and Ethiopian Jews, Argentine and French Jews and Jews from Arab countries are among the millions of persecuted and oppressed Jewish immigrants who have come to Israel.

Those who say this Knesset law proves that Arabs suffer discrimination in Israel are speaking nonsense. Like Israeli Jews, Israeli Arabs are members of the cabinet and Knesset and the law courts, they are consul generals and attend Israeli colleges and medical and law and graduate schools. They have full voting rights, citizenship, medical insurance and pension plans.

One of the few differences is that they are not required to perform military service, but that is hardly a case of discrimination – rather, it shows great sensitivity to Israeli Arabs. In fact, if the blacks of South Africa had enjoyed the same rights as the Arabs in Israel, discrimination would never have been a serious issue there.

It is also surprising that those organizations opposed to this bill are not on record condemning genuine racism and discrimination in the practices of many Arab states. In Jordan and the Palestinian Authority and other Arab states, it is illegal to sell any land to Jews under punishment of death. Saudi Arabia, in addition to such practices, bans any expression of religion other than Wahhabi Islam – there are no churches or synagogues, or even religious services in a hall, permitted by Saudi law and women are prohibited from driving cars. Where are the critics when it comes to genuine human rights abuses in Arab states? Why, instead, do they seek to limit the rights of Jews to lease privately owned land in Israel purchased for that very purpose?

Ronald Lauder, president of the JNF, had it right when he said: "This Knesset decision reaffirms the vision and the dream of Theodor Herzl and the millions of Jews over the past 106 years who contributed and participated in the rebirth of a Jewish nation after 2,000 years. The land of Israel is part of the very existence of the Jewish people from as far back as Abraham. We are a people linked to our land. Now and forever."

The Knesset bill is one step toward securing this precious legacy and it deserves the support of all American Jewish organizations.

Love is contagious

Aiden McGuire is both a Yankee fan, and an amazing friend.

Aiden and Michael Sayre have been buddies since childhood. Now in their mid-20s, they are also diehard Yankee fans.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But it's getting harder for Michael to follow the Yankees, because he suffers from congenital glaucoma, a condition that's left him blind in one eye and rapidly losing vision in the other. Until recently, Michael had never seen a live Yankee game, and it looked like he'd never have a chance to see one, either.

Then in March, Aiden wrote a letter to the Yankees that said: "I'd like to tell you about my best friend, Michael Sayre… Michael is a 25-year-old diehard Yankees fan. He was born with glaucoma. Recently, he lost all vision in his right eye. Right now he's hanging on to what vision he has left in his left eye, and his doctors don't know how long it will remain healthy."

The Yankees gave Aiden and Michael two tickets behind home plate and a VIP tour of Yankee Stadium, where they met future Hall-of-Famers Alex Rodriguez, Derek Jeter and Roger Clemens. It was truly a Yankee fan's dream. Perhaps Michael described it best: "I was going crazy. My head was going to explode."

Aiden and Michael's friendship grabs your heart and inspires you. Pirkei Avot tells us that an enduring friendship is based on "love independent of ulterior motives." Michael and Aiden share that type of friendship, and it's impossible not to be moved by Aiden's sincerity.

And that's precisely my point: love is contagious.

One sincere act of kindness can inspire a dozen others. Aiden's letter inspired the Yankees, and the team's kindness inspired others: American Limousine chipped in with transportation, JetBlue offered airfare, the Peninsula New York hotel delivered lodging, Majestic Athletic pitched in a jersey, and Hillerich & Bradsby shipped personalized bats.

One letter started a chain reaction of kindness. Sincerity inspires others to share in the gift of friendship.

In the Book of Ruth, one woman's kindness changes the course of history. Ruth, a foreign widow, treats her ex-mother-in-law, Naomi, with loyalty and love. Her kindness inspires Naomi's relative, Boaz, to be kind to Ruth. Ruth and Boaz marry, and the people of Bethlehem, inspired by their kindness, bless them on their wedding day. Ruth's baby, Oved, begets Jesse, who begets David, the future King of Israel. One woman's kindness literally gives birth to future redemption.

Yes, kindness begets kindness, which begets even more kindness. Human hearts are open, ready to catch the "love bug."

That's why when good people such as Aiden, Ruth, Boaz or Michael tell their story, they'll all tell you the same thing: love is contagious.

Achieving bat mitzvah equality

My daughter had one request for her bat mitzvah. After attending many bat mitzvah services with no real prayer or random speeches about Jewish heroines, she said, "I want Torah at my bat mitzvah."

She wanted to read the entire weekly portion, including the Haftorah, and comment on the reading, as she had seen others do. True, the friend and cousin who most inspired her were male, but she did not say, "I want to do it like the boys do." She simply wanted to do it "right." And coming from a Jewish day school, attending synagogue regularly, to her "doing it right" meant doing it all.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Some may interpret this as cheeky, rebellious or political. Actually, it was an innocent request of a child of this century who is blessed not to view everything through a gender lens, who is inspired by what particular kids do, not the fact that it is a boy or a girl doing it. The result was a relative rarity in the Jewish world: a traditional Shabbat service with a mechitzah separating men and women, but with a woman chanting the full Torah reading as both men and women blessed the Torah.

In truth, the egalitarian praying and the traditional division confused even many of our own guests, who could not figure out how to label us – although some similar models are developing in Jerusalem and elsewhere. Besides delighting in our daughter's mastery of Va'etchanan – a particularly long and complex parshah – and in her thanking of her teachers at school and from shul for preparing her, my wife and I were satisfied that we could fulfil her vision for her rite of passage.

If a bat mitzvah is supposed to launch young Jews on their independent Jewish journeys, if the idea is to welcome them, I can't understand the logic of putting a "Keep Out" sign on the Torah itself.

Amid so much angst these days about kids distancing themselves from Judaism, we would not tell our daughter, "Sorry, you can only read part of the Torah," or "Sorry, you can't do it in a real service." I reject those Orthodox bat mitzvah services that parade everyone through an artificial exercise that anyone who knows anything knows is not a real prayer service.

In preparing for her bat mitzvah, my daughter participated in a wonderful women's Rosh Chodesh service at the start of every Jewish month. In the spring, she led part of the service. This time, the women sat in the centre, and the half dozen of us males who were invited sat in the women's section on the side. My father-in-law bristled as he sat "in exile." I left convinced that just as the Passover Haggadah commands us to feel as if we personally escaped Egypt, every male should sit in the women's section occasionally. The world looks very different from a restricted side view than it does from premium box seats.

Equality need not mean sameness. I appreciate Judaism's celebrating and consecrating the differences between men and women. I like that my wife lights Shabbat candles while I say Kiddush over the wine. But we are all smart enough to know when distinguishing between men and women acknowledges differences respectfully and when it creates hierarchy.

A mechitzah down the middle separating men and women creates equal but different sanctuaries. Relegating women to the side or the balcony exiles them to the proverbial back of the bus. Similarly, a bat mitzvah celebration with an asterisk, a partial embrace of the Torah rather than a full clasp, risks distancing young girls from Judaism.

This situation is particularly absurd, because the most inequitable restrictions against women are rabbinic improvisations that are not specified in the Torah itself.

Women's traditional roles reflect women's historic roles. But things have changed. Until the overreaction to 19th-century Reform, Judaism traditionally had been an Etz Chaim, a tree of life, growing slowly but steadily. We cannot keep non-essential, alienating medieval rabbinic decrees frozen in time. We must prune selectively, sparingly, cautiously, allowing for gradual development so Judaism – and modern Jews – can flourish.

I am glad my wife and I fulfilled our daughter's remarkable wish. We invite other parents from the traditional world to give their daughters the same gift.

The presence of the past

This summer, I had the privilege of joining two York University colleagues in Europe for a unique program in Holocaust education: Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future. Now in its fourth cycle, the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education spans three countries and two continents.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Designed primarily for future teachers by Mark Webber, director of York's Centre for German and European Studies, and Michael Brown, former director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, the program brings together Canadian, German and Polish university students. The ongoing success of the program rests with the vision, sensitivity and careful planning on the part of my two colleagues, for whom it is a labour of love.

The program is built on field study – travel to sites of Jewish life and death, coupled with seminars, lectures, and workshops. The intensive study of the history of the Nazi genocide as well as the cultural and religious life of European Jews prior to the Holocaust is framed by Canadian ideals of diversity and tolerance.

The students' learning experience doesn't end at the close of the European field study component. The students propose a research project to complete over the next six months. In February, the Polish and German students will join their Canadian cohorts at York.

In addition to sharing the fruits of their research, the students take part in a Canadian field study component, exploring the ethnic, cultural and religious diversity of Canada's multicultural society. The program culminates in a symposium on Holocaust and anti-racism education hosted by York.

While I have worked with the program before, during the Canadian segment, and have been impressed by the thoughtful engagement of the students, this was the first time I joined the group in Europe. Only by travelling and working with the group can one fully appreciate the depth, seriousness, and intensity of the program.

The program is truly international in scope. German and Polish university professors, committed to facing the past, accompany and teach the group.

Clearly, the governments of the three countries see the significance of the program.

At an evening hosted by the Canadian embassy in Berlin, for example, Jutta Limbach, former chief justice of the German Federal Constitutional Court, spoke of multilingualism as a key to understanding other cultures, to seeing them on their own terms.

At the Canadian embassy in Warsaw, Abraham Rotfeld, a former foreign minister of Poland, spoke to the group about the history, experience and contributions of Jews in Poland.

The international cohort of students spent four weeks travelling through Germany and Poland learning about European Jewish life and culture, as well as the development of Nazism and the tightening of the genocidal net. By focusing on the stories of individual communities, along with broad social and political movements, the students engaged with the past with an eye toward the future. As teachers, how might they develop lessons and curricula that counter anti-Semitism and racism?

At memorial sites and museums, they were encouraged to see them not as tourists but as educators. Who is the intended visitor to a particular memorial? What message is communicated? How is it connected with the history and politics of the culture in which it's located? Would you bring school children there, and if so, how might you prepare them?

The students were asked to notice not only what they see, but what they cannot see; not only what they hear, but what they cannot hear. In visiting synagogues in Munich, Berlin, Krakow and Warsaw, they recognized the absence of the communities that once populated services.

In the ruins of the old Jewish cemetery of the Polish town Oswiecim – renamed Auschwitz by the occupying Nazi regime – desecrated matzevot had been collected and restored to the graveyard, lined up in random order, with no way to match the tombstone to the grave. There are no longer any living Jews in Oswiecim to mourn their departed ancestors.

As the students struggle with the past, and with their own relationships to that past, they also struggle to come to know one another and to understand how that past might speak differently to them, based on the experience of their home country and their family.

They learn to ask tough questions of themselves, and to listen to the other with empathy and respect. Most importantly, they make a commitment to the past and to the future.

The Kirshner File

Einstein was an unconventional thinker

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Walter Isaacson, the former managing editor of Time magazine and the ex-chief executive officer of the CNN television network, is a strong proponent of adult education. Several years ago, while working on a biography of Albert Einstein, whom he describes as "the most creative scientific genius of modern times," he concluded that he had to sharpen his already considerable skills as a journalist to better understand the complexities of Einstein's "crowning glory," the general theory of relativity. Isaacson, therefore, hired a tutor to instruct him in the arcana of advanced mathematics. But for Isaacson, who studied history, literature, politics, philosophy and economics at Harvard and Oxford universities, these tutorials were hardly daunting. "It was not heavy labour," said Isaacson, who was here recently to publicize Einstein: His Life and Universe (Simon & Schuster). "I love science."

Equally at home in both the arts and sciences, and the author of biographies on Henry Kissinger and Benjamin Franklin, Isaacson was seriously drawn to Einstein after being named editor of Time in 1995 – a position he held for the next six years – and launching deliberations to select its person of the century. There were no shortage of candidates, of course. But Isaacson, 55, plumped for Einstein – a German Jew who settled in the United States after the Nazis' rise to power – and his view prevailed.

The scion of an old New Orleans Jewish family of German and British stock, and currently the president of the Aspen Institute think-tank in Washington, D.C., he convinced his colleagues that Einstein was indeed worthy of the honour, due to his undisputed place in contemporary science.

Einstein, who was an examiner in Switzerland's patent office before becoming an academic, wrote four pivotal papers in the early 1900s that revolutionized physics and sealed his reputation as a great scientist. He proved that light can be conceived as particles and waves, that molecules and atoms exist, that there is no such thing as absolute time and space and that there is an equivalence between energy and mass.

With these seminal papers, he demolished a sweeping pronouncement by a revered British scientist in 1900 that there was "nothing new" to be discovered in physics.

Far from being esoteric, Einstein's ideas laid the foundation for two of the biggest advances in physics – relativity and quantum theory – and had wide-ranging practical applications as well.

"His fingerprints are all over today's technologies," Isaacson observed, citing the development of photoelectric cells and lasers, nuclear power and fibre optics, space travel and even semiconductors. To Isaacson, Einstein's success was rooted in three elements. He questioned conventional wisdom, challenged authority and marvelled at mysteries that struck others as mundane. In short, he was a nonconformist who abhorred the herd mentality.

"He could think unconventionally. One of his maxims was that imagination is more important than knowledge." Like a child, Einstein never lost his sense of wonder at the magic of the physical world: magnetic fields, gravity, inertia, acceleration and light beams.

Isaacson's book, which has been on the New York Times' bestseller list, is but the latest in a long line of Einstein biographies. His, however, is the first to draw on Einstein's new collected papers, which were released last year, contain more than 14,000 documents and will fill 25 volumes when fully published.

Walter Isaacson

"I was given special access to that archive," said Isaacson. "And I was able to take advantage of some new analysis of the notebooks Einstein used as he was working up his theory of relativity."

As Isaacson pointed out, biographies in the past dwelled on his scientific breakthroughs or his personal life and politics.

Einstein is different. "I try to weave all these strands together in one tapestry," explained Isaacson, who dedicates his hefty, well-written book to his father, an engineer who imbued him with an appreciation of science and math. "Mathematics is the good lord's brush stroke for painting physical reality," he said. "It's an imaginative endeavour and is as creative as poetry and music. We shouldn't find mathematics any more intimidating than Shakespeare."

Given Isaacson's penchant for and background in math and science, he had no trouble immersing himself in the minutiae of the Einstein canon. Yet he knew that he would be required to call on expert help. In this humble spirit, he turned to a succession of famous American scientists, from Douglas Stone, a professor of physics at Yale University who vetted the science, to Murray Gell-Mann, the winner of the 1969 Nobel Prize in physics who checked chapters on relativity and quantum mechanics.

Einstein in 1933 in California

Not surprisingly, Isaacson also consulted his father. "He read the book at least three times in manuscript form and made a variety of good suggestions."

If Isaacson could have had a conversation with Einstein – who died in 1955 – he would have asked him one nagging question: Why was he so intellectually rebellious when he was young, yet so staunch a defender of classical physics when he was old? It remains a conundrum, but Isaacson believes that Einstein's outsider status as a Jew, accentuated by his exposure to anti-Semitism in Europe, prompted him to challenge received wisdom and thus deviate from well-worn paths.

The Zurich Polytechnic turned him down for a job, leaving Einstein with the impression that anti-Semitic animus was a factor in his rejection. The University of Zurich offered him a professorship in 1909, but only after some faculty members were assured that he did not possess the "unpleasant peculiarities" allegedly associated with Jews.

Isaacson contends that the emergence of virulent anti-Semitism in Germany after World War I heightened Einstein's identification with his Jewish background and led him to embrace Zionism, despite his general aversion to nationalism.

Einstein, whose first wife was a Serbian, soured on assimilation after the assassination of Walther Rathenau – the Jewish foreign minister of Weimar Germany – in 1922.

Shortly afterward, he made his first and only trip to Palestine. Yet, as Isaacson notes, Einstein – a pacifist until Hitler assumed the chancellorship of Germany in 1933 – held that Jews and Arabs, "the two great Semitic peoples," had a common future and should co-operate.

Although he subscribed to Zionism, Einstein, an advocate of a one-world government and a supporter of socialist economic policies, was an opponent of a Jewish state until the establishment of Israel. "I cannot understand why it is needed," he said in 1946. But with Israel's creation in 1948, Einstein's attitude changed.

When Chaim Weizmann, Israel's first president, died in 1952, the post was offered to Einstein, then a member of the Institute of Advanced Studies in Princeton, N.J. He was "deeply moved" by the offer, but felt that he lacked "the natural aptitude and the experience to deal properly with people and to exercise official function."

Isaacson is certain that Einstein would have been a horrible president. "He was never good at going along with consensus and his puckish sense of humour would have gotten him into trouble."

A frequent visitor to Israel, Isaacson was profoundly affected by his authorship of Einstein.

"In doing this book, I was struck by Einstein's deepening connection with the Jewish people, and this has served to solidify my own Jewish identity."

Liberals, NDP are no-shows at seniors' debate

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Election 2007

A political debate hosted by a group representing nearly 5,000 Jewish seniors turned into a Tory information session when provincial Liberal and NDP candidates failed to show up.

Nearly 100 members of the Toronto Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS) assembled over coffee and bagels at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on Aug. 16 expecting to hear from candidates from the three major political parties ahead of the Oct. 10 provincial election.

Scheduled or asked to attend were David Zimmer, Liberal MPP for Willowdale; Bernie Tanz, Conservative candidate for Eglinton-Lawrence; Mike Colle, Liberal MPP for Eglinton-Lawrence; and Rini Ghosh, NDP candidate for Willowdale.

But Tanz and fellow PC-er David Shiner, candidate for Willowdale, were the only politicians to appear.

Not surprisingly, the meeting quickly turned into a two-hour promotional event for the Conservatives.

Ruth Goldsmith, spokesperson for the AJS, was disappointed that only one side of the political spectrum was represented at the event.

"We wanted to ask [all the candidates] what their positions are on issues that affect seniors… affordable housing, transport, health care," she said, adding that many seniors might now be more tempted to vote Conservative due to the perceived lack of interest by the other candidates to partake in the talk.

Zimmer cancelled, citing a busy schedule, and aides for Ghosh and Colle said they were "unavailable" for the morning meeting, another AJS spokesperson said. (Calls to the three candidates' offices were not returned.)

As a result, both Tanz and Shiner stumped unopposed for Conservative leader John Tory, and they urged the seniors to put their faith in their party.

A third guest speaker, Josh Cooper, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Action Committee, a non-partisan group whose mission is to encourage Jewish Canadians to get involved in politics, also addressed the group.

In the 2004 federal election, Cooper was the Conservative candidate for Thornhill, but lost to Liberal Susan Kadis.

His talk, however, was non-partisan, and he called on those present to get involved in some fashion and vote for whomever they liked. He reminded the seniors that Jewish politicians and politicians sympathetic to Jews helped change racist practices in the province many years ago.

"Your generation understands the importance of voting," Cooper said. "The younger generation doesn't remember the time in Toronto when Jews… were told to use separate washrooms. Don't ever think that your vote doesn't make a difference."

During a question-and-answer period, some seniors challenged the candidates to assure them that they can look forward to a better quality of life from a provincial Tory government, while others used the opportunity to vent frustrations at governments for increasing taxes.

One cantankerous man stood up and expressed contempt for politics in general. "I've heard these same speeches for 40 years from every government. Nothing changes," he shouted.

Shiner and Tanz responded by invoking pledges made by their party on some of the big-ticket issues in this election campaign, such as promises of funding for faith-based schools and transportation, and to upload costs from municipalities back to the province to relieve pressure on property taxes.

They tried to placate the audience, saying that Tory's "word is his bond" and that he will fulfil all his campaign pledges.

Ben Goldmintz, MC and AJS president, closed the event by reminding those present of the association's tongue-in-cheek election motto: "Remember, we're old enough to vote."

The dark side of the Hamas spin machine

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Last month, following the release of Gaza-based BBC correspondent Alan Johnston, who had been held hostage for 114 days until Hamas forced his captors to let him go, the organization put on a "charm offensive" for the sake of western audiences.

Hamas orchestrated tours of Gaza for large numbers of foreign correspondents, showcasing the organization's efforts to restore tranquility and order to Gaza in the aftermath of its violent rout of Fatah.

The correspondents not only reported what Hamas officials wanted them to see, but they also pointed out Hamas' blatant attempt to "spin" them. In fact, the Globe and Mail's Mark MacKinnon ("On tour with the Gaza spin machine," July 31) remarked sardonically that their heads were "spinning from the spin."

The darker reality is that the radical Islamic group makes open, critical reporting from Gaza virtually impossible. The few western journalists who do try to report critically often face intimidation.

Yet as bad as things are for western correspondents, they are even worse for Palestinian journalists who try to report stories that Hamas finds unacceptable.

Reporting for Associated Press on Aug. 13, Ibrahim Barzak described how, in the midst of trying to stop a protest by about 300 people in the Gaza Strip against Hamas, "militiamen" from that organization not only beat and arrested protesters, but also "confiscated equipment from news photographers and cameramen seeking to cover the arrests, including an Associated Press stills camera."

Hamas then went further, raiding the Gaza offices of Arab media organizations such as Gulf-based satellite broadcaster Al-Arabiyya, looking to confiscate any material from the rally.

(Fatah too, especially under the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's rule, was notorious for intimidating journalists reporting events that Arafat and his cronies didn't want aired.)

Aug. 15 marked the 60th anniversary of the partition of India into the Muslim state of Pakistan and the (largely) Hindu state of India. The Canadian and international media were full of stories and commentaries to mark the occasion.

Many of these reports described the civil war that erupted between Muslims and Hindus prior to partition, resulting in as many as one million deaths (according to Pankaj Mishra in "Exit Wounds," The New Yorker, Aug. 13). After partition, between 12 and 15 million people became refugees – with Muslims moving from India to Pakistan, and Hindus moving from Pakistan to India. In a great many cases, people who wished to remain were forced by authorities to flee. As a result, Pakistan today is 96 per cent Muslim.

This November, the media will most likely mark another 60th anniversary – the UN General Assembly Partition Resolution for Palestine that was the basis for the creation of Israel in May 1948. It also should have been the basis for the creation of an Arab state alongside Israel, except that the Palestinian leadership and Arab states violently rejected the proposal.

Because of this rejection, most Jews who were evicted from Arab lands became citizens of Israel or western countries. However, Palestinians who either fled the subsequent fighting or, in some cases, were forced to flee by Israeli forces became permanent refugees who declare and continue to battle for their "right of return" to Israel.

Several years ago, Israeli law professor Amnon Rubinstein wrote about the irony that while many voices around the world advocate for a Palestinian "right of return," no one declares that in the India-Pakistan case refugees have a "right of return" to their former homes in either country. The clamour in the one case, but the silence in the other, certainly deserves reflection.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
>
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

The Kabbalah experience

By RABBI JERRY STEINBERG

The Hebrew word Kabbalah means "to receive." The question is, receive what? The answer given by most Kabbalists would be "the divine influx."

Again we have a question: what is the divine influx? This is understood as information, inspiration and understanding coming from a source outside of conventional consciousness, from another realm of reality, from the Place of God. In this sense, Moses, the prophets and and many other biblical personalities were Kabbalists – they were in a state of reception, waiting to hear or see a divine being, whether it was an angel or some other celestial figure. Sometimes the divine influx came in a vision or a dream and on occasion in a clear voice, as for example, the prophet Samuel when he was a young boy.

While in some quarters of the Jewish world it's believed that prophecy (the reception of a divine voice or vision) came to an end about 22 centuries ago, in reality, it continued on after the completion of the Hebrew Scriptures, and there are many examples of rabbis since that time who have heard voices and seen visions. There is, in fact, a term in the Talmud that is used to describe an auditory call from God – Bat Kol (which literally means "the daughter of a voice" but is usually translated as "a still, small voice").

Some well-known rabbis over the past 500 years have had unusual experiences regarding the divine influx, particularly in the form of voices and visions. Rabbi Joseph Caro (16th century), to whom we owe a major codification of Jewish law, the Shulchan Aruch, was adept at hearing a voice that he identified as the Mishnah. This voice came through him to his disciples and expounded often on points of Jewish law.

What Rabbi Caro did in the 16th century we might today call channeling, a phenomenon that occurred in abundance in the 80s and 90s, especially in North America. Voices ascribed to other dimensions of reality would speak through certain individuals, imparting both general and specific information in a variety of areas from philosophy to religion to medicine. Names such as Edgar Cayce, Seth, Emmanu-El and Ramtha are known to those who followed this trend.

In the 18th century, two Jewish luminaries, the Vilna Gaon and the Baal Shem Tov, experienced heavenly excursions and wrote about them. In a rare and now famous epistle, the Ball Shem Tov (the founder of Chassidism) spoke about the ascent of his soul to a heavenly domain: "On the day of Rosh Hashanah [September 1746], I engaged in an ascent of the soul as you know I do, and I saw wondrous things in that vision that I had never before seen since the day I had attained to maturity. That which I saw and learned in my ascent is impossible to describe or to relate even from mouth to mouth. But as I returned to the lower Garden of Eden, I saw many souls, both of the living and the dead, those known to me and those unknown."

The Vilna Gaon reflects on a nocturnal visitor: "Last night Elijah [the prophet] visited me. If I remember rightly, my informants did say in name that it was Elijah, but possibly it was some other messenger from the celestial academy who revealed awesome things."

And finally, the "Ari," Rabbi Isaac Luria (16th century), whose disciples tell of his studies on high: "[He was one] whose soul ascended nightly to the heavens and whom the attending angels came to accompany to the celestial academy… And to whichever academies he wished to go, the angels would take him. The next day he would disclose to the sages what he learned in that academy."

If we look at the 11th chapter of the Book of Numbers, we might speculate that Moses would be very pleased with the men mentioned here. He said "If only all of God's people were prophets that God put His spirit upon them."

Pronouncements of agreement

Midrashic Moments

As the summer months continue and we draw closer to the High Holy Days, we continue to read the book of Deuteronomy and hear the words of Moses.

Certainly the entire book of Deuteronomy is equal to and accepted as level with the other books of the Torah. Yet there is much discussion within Jewish literature as to how we are to understand that the words of Moses could gain such stature.

Early on, the Talmud clearly states that all the words in the book of Deuteronomy are dictated by God to Moses in the same fashion as the first four books of the Torah were dictated.

By the Middle Ages, one commentator distinguishes elements within Deuteronomy. The elements that repeat portions found earlier within the Torah are the words of Moses while the elements that are new are Divine words.

As Jewish history continued to unfold, commentators agreed or disagreed with the proportion of the Divine words versus Moses' human words, until we reach points of view that state that the book of Deuteronomy is entirely made up of Moses' words to which God agreed.

In fact, God agreed so completely that God then commanded Moses to write his thoughts down. One of the most beautiful expressions of this thought was expressed by a Jewish thinker in the modern world. Rabbi Shlomo Riskin has published his view, based on the Kotzker Rebbe, in which he states that the words of Deuteronomy are the words of Moses offered on high, to which God answered, "Amen."

With this profound image in mind, the power of the narrative shifts to the tiny word at the end, "amen."

The word is said so often by every Jewish person that we are often in automatic mode when we hear a blessing and quickly dispense an "amen." In fact, we are so used to hearing the word at the end of a blessing that at times we can hear people answering "amen" to their own blessings, something the rabbis of the Talmud have expressly forbidden. Perhaps we have underestimated or misunderstood the power of "amen."

The Talmud describes the word "amen" as an acronym representing the Hebrew phrase that means "God, a faithful ruler." When we recite the Shema in private, this is the Hebrew phrase we say quietly, immediately before our Shema proclamation. Yet the word itself is rooted in the word emunah, faith. It's fitting that it's the acronym that precedes our strongest declaration of faith, the Shema. Clearly, as an acronym, it functions to inform us of a Divine attribute: faithfulness.

But amen itself means "I agree." It's in this context that we use it when answering someone who has uttered a blessing. We listen to the blessing and state openly to the speaker, "Amen" – I agree with the truth you have just expressed. This is why we don't say "amen" to our own prayers – it would be redundant. We assume that we meant what we just said in prayer and, therefore, we would not have to conclude with a statement of agreement.

To say "amen" to someone who is praying is to publicly state your support for their heartfelt expression. To say "amen" is to take a stand just as to remain silent when hearing a blessing is to take a stand. There is no neutral territory. We either support the prayers of someone, or we do not. Whether we are uttering the words of a prayer or passively listening to another person, prayer is always active and we are always taking a stand for which we may be challenged.

We are forbidden to say "amen" to inappropriate prayers. The Talmud cites an example of a prayer in which someone prays that God take someone's life. Such a prayer is inappropriate and all those who say "amen" will be counted as if they themselves uttered the prayer. We know that we must be actively engaged in our prayers, but the bar has been raised higher when we understand that we must actively be engaged in deciding when to say "amen."

Moses recites the words of the fifth book of the Torah, Deuteronomy, and God hears these words as a prayer and answers "amen" – I agree.

When the High Holy Days begin and Jews around the world offer our prayers to God, may we remember that every prayer can have several answers. We often think that God will answer our prayers with a "yes" or a "no." May we each merit that God answer our prayers with the tiniest of words that empower. May we each merit a Divine 'Amen'.

(I would like to thank the reader who prompted me to write further thoughts on Deuteronomy.)

The Dead Sea Scrolls, Pt. 2

In my last column, I wrote about the Dead Sea Scrolls and their discovery. It is a story filled with intrigue and adventure. Here the story continues.

By the late 1970s, most of the scrolls were in Israeli-held territory, but Israel did not want to upset the status quo of scrolls research. As a result, the scrolls were still in the hands of a small, select group of researchers. The researchers were part of the original scrolls team that had been set up in the 1950s, headquartered in the Rockefeller Museum of east Jerusalem, which at the time was controlled by Jordan. The majority of these scholars were Catholic. One of the exceptions was Frank Cross of Harvard University.

Past Forward

It was envisaged that the publication of the scrolls would encompass 20 volumes, to be published by Oxford University Press under the title of Discoveries in the Judean Desert of Jordan or DJD for short. Ten years after the Six Day War of 1967, only six of the 20 volumes had been published. That led Geza Vermes, a distinguished scrolls scholar from Oxford University, to comment to me that he despaired of ever seeing the material, even before he died. The delay in publication spawned a conspiracy theory in which it was postulated that the Catholic Church was holding back scrolls, which would damage the Catholic faith.

Indeed, the original editor of the scrolls project was the legendary Dominican monk and scholar, Pere Roland de Vaux, head of the Ecole Biblique Dominicain in Jerusalem, whom I had met while excavating at Et Tell, the site of the biblical city of Ai, in 1968. Some scholars believe that it was because of de Vaux's monastic connections that he formulated the Essene hypothesis, which implies that the Essenes, the reputed authors of the scrolls, led a monastic existence at the site of Qumran where the scrolls were discovered. This theory has had an enormous impact on scrolls research.

De Vaux himself had led a mysterious life before joining the Dominicans, and there were many stories circulating about his escapades. Some said he had been a circus performer, while others believed he had served in the French Foreign Legion. The impression he left with me was that of a quick-witted, small, wiry man who clambered up and down the tell, the hill, at Deir Dibwan while chain-smoking foul-smelling French cigarettes.

After de Vaux's death, another Dominican scholar, Pierre Benoit, succeeded him. Benoit struck me as being a serious, studious man when I met him. He was quite upset when I asked him about the veracity of the conspiracy theories and gave me carte blanche to examine the scrolls under his control when I spoke to him in the early 1980s.

Upon Benoit's death, John Strugnell became head of the scrolls publication team. He was a professor at the Harvard Divinity School. I had met Strugnell in 1980, while doing interviews for a CBC series on lost manuscripts.

I remember going to Strugnell's home, which looked like something out of skid row, and being struck by the incongruity of seeing a batch of scrolls facsimiles on a filthy couch. Ultimately, Strugnell's drinking problem and an indiscreet comment about Judaism to an Israeli newspaper would force him to step down as head of the publication team. Shortly afterward, the Israelis took over the scrolls operation, and a number of events occurred that made the scrolls accessible to anyone who wanted to see them.

The initial goal of publishing 20 volumes has now been surpassed. As for my connection with these fabled documents – this past year, the scrolls once more re-entered my life when the Israel Antiquities Authority, which controls the scrolls, asked me to help them bring a major exhibit of the Dead Sea Scrolls to Toronto. It is a project that I have undertaken with enthusiasm. Once more, the Past moves Forward for me.

Jewish and Israeli podcasts, Pt. 2

There are dozens, perhaps hundreds of podcasts that focus on Israel or the Jewish world. Here are a few that are sure to entertain, educate and provoke, too.

The Jewish Highway

Nextbook, "A gateway to Jewish literature, culture, and ideas" has created a wide-ranging podcast to complement its impressive website. Recent offerings include:

- An interview with Cory Kahaney, whose off-Broadway show pays homage to Jewish female comedians of the 1950s, including Totie Fields and Jean Carroll;
- Alex Halberstadt explains how in the early 20th century Yossele Rosenblatt became the world's most renowned cantor;
- And we meet "Captain Jack" Johnson and find out how he "contributed to Jewish statehood" when he signed on as a second mate on the ship Exodus in 1947. [tinyurl.com/323ytg]

Perhaps the sweetest podcast to grace my computer and MP3 player is titled 1-2-3 Jewish Kids & Me. The format is simple: an anonymous father and his equally anonymous daughter read aloud stories tied to the Jewish calendar. For Shavuot, we hear why Mount Sinai was chosen for the giving of the Torah even though it didn't have the highest of peaks. [tinyurl.com/ 2wedg9]

Feed Me Bubbe takes the cross-generational motif a step further.

This delightful video podcast pairs Avrom Honig with his sweetheart of a bubbie, Bayla Sher. In recent episodes, she demonstrates the secrets behind her mouth-watering blintzes, kasha varnishkes, tzimmes, fricassee and the classic Chicken Soup Chicken. Bonus: the home page of this site has a lovely documentary about how this podcast came to be – along with a cameo appearance by zaide. [tinyurl.com/ 2vmb3y]

Long before anyone had heard of podcasts, Louis Brandsdorfer was recording his mother's story of horror and survival during the Holocaust. Thanks to technology that has developed since those recording were done, you can listen to and download Malka Brandsdorfer's recollections, The Bleeding Sky. She speaks Yiddish for the interviews and the free downloadable book is in English. [tinyurl.com/2hhhcy]

Rabbi Joseph Bloch and his wife, Yael, produce a regular and chatty podcast about current affairs in their country called Rabbi Joe in Jerusalem. In a recent edition, you can hear Rabbi Joe seethe over the small pension that was offered to Holocaust survivors in Israel. In other provocative casts, he asks whether Arabs are getting a raw deal in Hollywood, how modern Orthodoxy should treat the intermarried and whether sexual morality is still relevant. [tinyurl.com/zhe9j]

Meir Schweiger is also a rabbi from Jerusalem. But his podcast focuses on the weekly Torah portion rather than on current events. Rabbi Schweiger is a senior faculty member at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies. [tinyurl.com/ 3crotn]

Temple Isaiah, a Reform synagogue in Lafayette, Calif., wants to be part of Your Jewish Neighborhood through its podcast. Recently editions featured Cantor Leigh Korn on his travels to the tiny Jewish communities of Rhodes, Greece, and Dubrovnik, Croatia. We hear about the challenges in recruiting and selecting religious school teachers that match the philosophy of your congregation. And there is a feature interview with singer-songwriter Neshama Carlebach. [yourjewish-neighborhood. libsyn.com/]

Does the news sometimes get you down? Then it may be time to subscribe to JNewsLight and what it calls The Lighter Side of Jewish News. Through short five- or six-minute podcasts, they survey some not-so-earth-shattering stories you may have missed. That's how I learned:

- That a Frank Lloyd Wright-designed synagogue in Elkins Park, Penn., has been designated a historic landmark;
- About Argentina's last Jewish cowboys;
- How a 2,000-year-old date seed is growing in Israel's Arava valley;
- And that actor Natalie Portman fought back tears of joy when she helped name a baby gorilla in Rwanda, while in that country with a group of celebrities and conservationists. [jnewslight.blogspot. com/]

. Do you have a favourite audio or video podcast that you find yourself returning to? Tell me about it and I may mention it in a future column.

UJA Federation names its first CEO of Jewish Community Services

Gail Bernstein excited to play important role in Tomorrow Campaign campuses

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA FEDERATION

It didn't appear likely that after 16 productive and satisfying years as CEO and General Manager of Toronto's International Centre, Detroit native Gail Bernstein was going to leave her position in search of greener pastures. That was until she was approached to take the reigns of a new position at UJA Federation as the CEO of Jewish Community Services of Greater Toronto. It was an offer which, as they say, she simply couldn't refuse.

In her new capacity, Bernstein is overseeing the business management of UJA Federation's three Tomorrow Campaign community campuses, ensuring the continued growth and excellence of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina; The Sherman Campus, which will soon break ground on the site of the current Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street, just north of Sheppard Avenue; and Vaughan's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus.

To Bernstein, the proposition of playing a key role in a project as immense and important as the Tomorrow Campaign is as inspiring as it is overwhelming.

"It is exciting to be able to share in the dream of the community's visionaries by joining Jewish Toronto from the southern end of the city up to and beyond its northern limits," Bernstein explained from her new office in the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services. "It is exceptionally meaningful that through this ambitious endeavour we will be bringing Jewish culture, health and wellness, fitness, and social services to all elements of society in a humane and vital way."

"Gail brings an incredible wealth and talent to UJA Federation," said UJA Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "That talent will help us reach our goals of operating our new campuses on a level of excellence that will solidify our investment and support the future of a thriving and compelling Jewish community."

Although this is the first time in Bernstein's illustrious career - which spans over 30 years - that she will have worked in the Jewish community, the idea was very appealing; it had always been a consideration of hers to eventually retire and volunteer with an organization that would make a difference. And it was her parents who were instrumental in instilling her with that value.

"I saw strong role models for Jewish philanthropy in my parents," Bernstein continued. "They were very active in our synagogue and B'nai Brith, and it's an image I have always carried with me. It had always affected the way I see the world."

The broad scope of the Tomorrow Campaign capital projects was very alluring, and one that eventually sold her on the position.

"This is an opportunity for me to finish my career working for the greater good, to leave a legacy - and it feels really good. It feels like a perfect fit."

From the Gaza Border: A mother's gratitude

Despite the fact that two Qassam rockets just fell about 200 metres from her home and her electricity is out, Marcell Bar-On refuses to be intimidated. "This is our reality. My husband's family founded this Kibbutz (Nir Am) and this is our home. We will not let anyone scare us from leaving," she says.

The reality, however, has taken a tremendous toll on her children, especially her youngest son Gabi. "Gabi was born in 1997," she says. "When he was three, the rockets started falling. He can't remember a time when there was no terror. His childhood has been fraught with never ending pressure."

By the time he was in the second grade, Gabi, like many of the Kibbutz and Sha'ar Hanegev region children, had developed extremely aggressive behaviour and his ability to concentrate in school was limited. Finally, Bar-On and her husband took him for psychological counseling. "This helped him considerably, but the rockets continue to fall, classes are constantly disrupted and the children study in shifts, as all of the classrooms are not fortified," explains Bar-On, who is a teacher at the regional school. "The fear is always with us."

"What truly helped the children this year were the enrichment activities and clubs provided by the Jewish Agency," she says. "Gabi takes Darbuka (drums) lessons and this is a wonderful outlet for him. He bangs on those drums and unleashes so much pent up energy. The class gives him so much joy and I see the change in him. He also enjoys the nature classes. There is something very calming about caring for animals."

Ten-year-old Gabi is benefitting from The Jewish Agency's A New Tomorrow program.

Bar-On also sees the change in the other school children. Through sports, music, drama and nature activities, the children are engaged in interesting activities that distract them from their everyday worries. "Our children are not able to play freely outside," she says. "These activities are a godsend. At the same time, many of the parents are struggling under terrible financial strain and would not have been able to afford these clubs."

With the generous support of the Federations of North America – including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto - the Jewish Agency, in conjunction with the Ministry of Education, put into place a network of formal and informal educational activities for children in northern and southern regions of Israel.

The program, called A New Tomorrow, began in the North after the Second Lebanon War and was launched in Sderot and the Gaza perimeter communities soon after. More than 47,000 children participated in the program during the school year, and it has helped many of them to overcome trauma and return to normal activities.

Perspective

Making public education fair for everyone

By DAVID KOSCHITZKY

This is an historic time for our community. The subject of integrating faith-based schools that meet provincial requirements into the public education system is back on the public agenda.

Its impact would be significant. Public funding for qualifying faith-based schools would correct decades of inequity in which only Catholic schools are part of the public system. The Catholic system is an excellent example of how well integration of faith-based schools into public education works. As a matter of fairness, inclusion should apply to all faith-based schools, including Jewish day schools.

As the system currently stands, parents who choose Jewish day school for their children are financially penalized for making that choice. They support public education, and they pay their taxes like everyone else in Ontario. And yet, their children remain shut out from the public school system.

David Koschitzky

On the other hand, 650,000 Ontario Catholic students receive the benefit of being educated within their faith, and within the public system. They participate in standardized testing; their teachers follow an approved provincial curriculum ensuring all students learn according to Canadian values and their presence strengthens public education in Ontario. That's the formula that should apply to all faith-based students.

Funding for Catholic schools is constitutionally required, but that does not justify the exclusion of other faith-based schools that not only meet provincial requirements but also educate thousands of graduates who have made invaluable contributions to Canadian society.

From Quebec westward, every province other than Ontario provides public funding for faith-based schools. Only Ontario funds one faith-based school system to the exclusion of all others.

Integrating Jewish day schools into the public system would provide relief to thousands of Jewish families making significant financial sacrifices so their children can receive a quality education, combining Canadian and Jewish values. It would ensure that what is being taught at faith-based schools is consistent with the values cherished by Canadians. And faith-based funding would provide more Jewish community financial resources for other urgent needs such as assistance for the poor and isolated seniors.

Helping our community better understand the value of integrating faith-based schools into public education is the first step to making it a reality.

Let's give our children the chance to be part of a strong, vital and inclusive public school system that reflects 21st century Ontario and passes the test of fairness.

David Koschitzky is Vice Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The Campaign For Our Jewish Future set to launch

New plan will tackle four areas of concern

By JO MICHAELS
UJA FEDERATION

There's less than a week to go before UJA Federation's 2008 community campaign launch on August 29 at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel. The launch traditionally attracts over 1,000 people.

Last year, UJA Federation's annual campaign was forced to quickly change into the Israel Emergency Campaign as Hezbollah began to attack Israel's northern communities just prior to the event.

"This year's launch has a different focus," says UJA Federation campaign director, Jeff Springer. "Although there is no longer a crisis in Israel, there are still a number of serious and mounting concerns both in Toronto and in Israel's peripheral communities. This year's campaign, The Campaign for Our Jewish Future, has been created to address these concerns. The launch on August 29th is the first opportunity for Toronto's Jewish community to learn about how we'll be taking action."

Dale Lastman

Lynn Belzberg

Although the full details of this year's vital campaign will not be released until the launch, the chairs of the event, Lynn Belzberg and Dale Lastman, have shared the four vital areas that will be the focus of The Campaign for Our Jewish Future.

"UJA Federation is embarking on a plan to address the pressing issues facing our community today," explains Belzberg. "It calls for a coordinated array of new, ambitious and focused initiatives that will create dramatic progress."

"These new collective initiatives will cover four vital areas of concern: inspiring Jewish identity among our next generation; standing with Israel in a time of great need; transforming lives within our underprivileged populations: and engaging the growing and dynamic Jewish community here in Toronto," adds Lastman.

"These four areas are all connected," says Springer. "They speak to social justice and Jewish ideals and they highlight our collective obligation to build a vibrant Jewish future."

Comedian and actor Larry Miller

Keynote speaker for the launch will be Larry Miller. A well-known actor and comedian, Miller is best known for his roles in films like Pretty Woman and Best in Show and television appearances on a number of shows including Seinfeld. Miller will be sharing his experiences of being an outspoken supporter of Israel while living in Hollywood.

Launch attendees will also be treated to a performance by the inspirational Tzeirei Sderot Choir, eight talented teenagers from Israel, Ethiopia and the Former Soviet Union, who will be flown in from Israel to perform. Through song, this talented group – making their first appearance in Canada - will share their stories of surviving countless Qassam rocket attacks in the southern Israeli community of Sderot, to which UJA Federation has provided considerable financial assistance.

Tickets are still available for $30, but are selling very quickly. To reserve your ticket for this important community event, call (416) 631-5700 or visit www.ujaevents.com/registration/2008launch.

UJA Federation helps welcome Darfur refugees to Eilat

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Since 2002, hundreds of thousands of innocent civilians have been murdered in Darfur. This summer, hundreds of Darfur refugees – making the sojourn from the battlefields of Western Sudan by foot - have been seeking shelter in Israel. Many of these embattled people find refuge with different aid organizations throughout the country.

Recently, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto played a vital role in helping these new members of Israeli society – particularly the children – feel welcome in the Jewish State.

UJA Federation – which has been supporting the Darfur refugees through the Jewish Agency for Israel - planned a special program which was funded through its Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative, which twins Eilat/Eilot with Toronto.

This father and his two young children - all refugees from Darfur - made their way from the war-torn Sudan to seek refuge in Eilat.

The program saw two organizations - Canada-Israel Experience (CIE), the Israel experience arm of UJA Federation best known for its birthright israel program, and Canadian Young Judaea - come together to play an important role in a vital humanitarian undertaking in Eilat.

Shai Ben Shmuel, a CIE group coordinator in Israel and Canadian Young Judaea's (CYJ) Josepha Michaelson created a heart warming program for close to 100 refugee children. Over the course of a few days, CYJ participants and their staff, along with CIE participants, created a series of recreational activities for these children aged 3 to 12.

Activities included beading, boondoggle, mask making, teaching songs, playing soccer, Israeli dancing, guitars and a special visit to Eilat's underwater observatory.

"This program is an incredible testament to the high level of cooperation and education that exists between the Toronto Jewish community and the people of the Eilat/Eilot region," said Michael Soberman, national director of Canada Israel Experience. "Through a generous subsidy provided to Canadian Young Judaea by UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 initiative, the CYJ participants were able to truly make a difference in these people's lives. This initiative has taught us all the Jewish value of treating the stranger among us with compassion and love."

"On a personal note, I've never been more proud of a group of campers than I am of this one," said Michaelson. "They put all the ideas together for the programs and ran them. I was barely able to hold back my tears watching campers holding these little kids and just hugging them. They definitely wanted to have more time with them there and want to know how they can continue being involved."

Six Hundred Immigrants from France arrive in Israel

Six hundred new immigrants recently arrived in Israel on two special flights from France, constituting the single largest group of immigrants to arrive in Israel this year. It was a coordinated effort of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and AMI, the French organization which promotes aliyah.

Immigration from France is expected to reach a 26-year high, with an expected 3,200 French Jews moving to Israel this year, the largest number since 1971, representing a 10 percent increase over last year, which saw 2,900 French immigrants.

The two flights, one from Paris and one from Marseilles, arrived simultaneously at Ben Gurion Airport where the newcomers were greeted by Israel's President Shimon Peres, Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger, Absorption Minister Yaakov Edri, Jewish Agency Chairman Zeev Bielski, AMI founder Pierre Besnainou and Keren Hayesod Chairman Avi Pazner. "Today is a holiday for Israel," said Bielski at the airport ceremony. "The day 600 Jews join us in Israel is a holiday."

Where's the beef? — Montreal of course

New kosher meat processor opens

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The owners of what is purportedly the largest kosher meat processing plant in Canada – opened in Montreal in June by the new company Minsky's Kosher Meats Inc., – intend to shake up an industry that they say is badly in need of modernization.

The 21,000-square-foot, highly automated facility koshers, butchers and packages fresh and frozen beef, veal and lamb, processes already-koshered poultry, and produces a line of deli meats under the label Minsky's Glatt Kosher.

Minsky's is supervised by Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir, inspected by the Canadian Food Inspection Agency and is HACCP-approved. Hazard Analysis Critical Control Points is an exacting standard of food safety implemented a few years ago by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and accepted internationally.

President Allan Cantor and chief executive officer Ron Simon said Minsky's is already supplying supermarkets, private butchers, caterers and restaurants in Montreal. They said it has also begun to distribute in Calgary, Edmonton, Ottawa and Winnipeg and will "very shortly" be in Toronto.

Cantor, who has experience in the non-kosher meat business, said the company wants to provide kosher consumers with more choice and convenience than is now available.

For example, Minsky's offers prime beef cuts that have been aged for 21 to 28 days, which no other kosher purveyor does, he said, and it has started to make marinated beef and chicken products.

The aim is to develop a full range of prepared foods that can be heated and served, including individual portions, similar to those sold at the non-kosher M&M Meat Shops.

"If the non-kosher consumer goes to her butcher and asks for honey-mustard marinated chicken breasts, for example, he'll likely say, 'No problem.' The kosher consumer can't get that," Cantor said.

Now running well below capacity, the plant, if operated at full tilt, could supply the current Canadian market for kosher meat two times over, he and Simon said.

They add that they're looking at the U.S. market as well, but not in the short term.

Cantor said they don't want to make the same mistakes as Levitts Kosher Foods Inc., once the largest kosher meat processor in Canada. The 65-year-old company went bankrupt in 2004 after opening a reported $6.5-million, 40,000 square-foot plant in LaSalle four years earlier.

Cantor, who is from Ottawa, emphasized that he began exploring entering the kosher meat business well before Levitts' demise, because he believes the market is rapidly growing, especially among non-Jews, because of concerns over meat safety.

He and Simon had considered opening in Toronto, where Simon – a co-owner of Supreme Foods, a distributor of organic, kosher and other specialty food – continues to live, but they chose Montreal for a number of reasons, not the least of which was the stringency of the Vaad and the wide recognition of its MK hechsher.

Under the Vaad's enhanced scrutiny since a kosher-chicken fraud was uncovered in Monsey, N.Y., last year, there is a mashgiach on-site at all times when meat is received, processed or shipped, and when he is not there, the meat is kept in lockers to which only he has the key, Cantor said.

All its beef comes from two slaughterhouses in Toronto, Ryding Regency and St. Helen's. The veal is from Montpac and Ecolart, and the lamb is from Forget, all Quebec abattoirs.

Chicken, turkey and duck are supplied by Montreal's Marvid and to a lesser extent Chai of Toronto.

Outrage forces removal of pro-Hezbollah billboard

By RON STANG
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. — Many in Windsor are breathing a sigh of relief after a controversial billboard depicting Lebanese Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, erected in the heart of the city's Arab Middle Eastern community, came down within days of being put up.

The billboard showed Nasrallah alongside smaller images of four other Lebanese leaders. The sign had both English and Arabic text. In English, it read, "Lebanese and Arab communities in Windsor city congratulate the Lebanese people for their steadfastness and endeavour to establish peace in Lebanon."

But the person who first brought the billboard to the public's attention, Edy Haddad, a University of Windsor student and a Lebanese-born Canadian, said the Arabic wording contained a reference to "fight" in it.

"There are two different sayings," Haddad, the former North American youth representative for Kataeb, a Lebanon-based, pro-democracy party, said of the sign. He said that in English the text stressed "the whole peace thing." But in Arabic, "they were trying to say this is our army, but they did it in a very nonchalant way, but there is a… [phrase] that had the word 'fight' in it."

Haddad, who lives two blocks from the billboard, put out a press release Aug. 10 and demanded that the "despicable" billboard, located along one of Windsor's busiest streets, be taken down. The release said Hezbollah "is on the terror watch list by Canada" and "has murdered countless numbers of civilians."

Since that time, Haddad said in an interview, he has received death threats and some people "were threatening to come to my house and beat me up."

The billboard raised alarm in Windsor generally, chiefly among the city's Jewish community, which made immediate efforts to contact elected politicans and the city's mayor to seek the sign's immediate removal.

Harvey Kessler, executive director of the Windsor Jewish Federation and Community Centre, said the "primary concern" was that the poster depicted an individual who "represents a terrorist organization that's banned in Canada." He said police, including the RCMP, were investigating.

By midday on Monday, Aug. 13 – three days after the billboard went up – the sign had been removed and replaced with an advertisement for a local auto dealership.

Kessler suggested that Windsor Mayor Eddie Francis, who is of Lebanese descent, was instrumental in having the poster taken down.

"He told me he was going to do everything in his power to make sure that billboard came down as quickly as possible," Kessler said. "I assume someone put pressure on the billboard sign company to take it down."

The billboard became a national news story. Kessler and the mayor's office received phone calls from across the country, mostly condemning the sign.

The incident appears to be unprecedented in Canada.

"The only situation I can recall that is at all analogous to this is the Jews for Jesus billboard that was put up at the corner of Bathurst [Street] and Wilson [Avenue in Toronto] a few years ago," said Len Rudner, national director of Community Relations for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). "The billboard, offensive in its presentation of a Holocaust survivor who had 'found' Jesus, was quickly taken down."

Rudner added that since the Canadian government has deemed Hezbollah to be a terrorist organization, "it is entirely inappropriate that the leader of Hezbollah should be portrayed in such an adulatory fashion." CJC commended the Windsor Jewish Federation and the mayor's office for having "this material removed from the public square."

Michele Erskine, marketing director for CBS Outdoor Canada, the company that owns the sign, called the entire incident "an honest mistake."

She said an employee at the firm's Windsor office "didn't recognize the full content" of the sign or recognize the significance of the pictures before putting it up.

"Since we realized the mistake was made, we've taken it down as fast as we could."

Attempts to reach the billboard's supporters were unsuccessful. The Windsor Star quoted Hussein Dabaja, who said various members of the Lebanese community took up a collection to pay for the sign and had made their point.

"The Jewish are not the enemy," Dabaja told the Star. "When Hezbollah fights the Israeli army, they fight the Israeli occupation to Lebanon."

The billboard went up just before the Aug. 12 one-year anniversary of Israel and Hezbollah agreeing to a United Nations-brokered ceasefire following last summer's war between the Jewish state and the Lebanese-based Shiite Muslim group.

Windsor's Lebanese community, which Haddad estimated at between 15,000 and 20,000 people, is typical of many such communities in Canada, divided between Christians and Muslims.

He added that "it's not all Muslims that support Hezbollah."

Kessler said that while a sign such as the pro-Hezbollah billboard increases tensions generally, "I think it's going to increase tensions most in the Arab and Lebanese communities, from what I'm hearing."

He added "there are many different perspectives" within the Lebanese community "on the politics of the Middle East."

Meanwhile, he said he will bring the matter to city hall's race and ethnocultural relations committee, hoping "protocols" will be developed in the event another such incident occurs.

Kessler said that on this occasion "the community reacted." But he said that in the event of a future incident, "we would have some proactive strategies or protocols in place."

Filmmaker's Dove ad campaign launched a promising career

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

In less than 60 seconds, Canadian director Yael Staav illustrates how our view of beauty has been manipulated and distorted by the media.

Her "Evolution" commercial, part of the Dove campaign for real beauty, is a fast-forward version of the transformation of a woman on the street to the model on the billboard. In the ad, the woman on film undergoes hairstyling, makeup and a series of computer-generated touch-ups before her makeover is complete.

"On the one hand, I think the message is something we all know, but at the same time, I know that one of the feelings women have when they watch the Dove spot is, 'I can't wait to show this to my boyfriend,'" said the 32-year-old Edmonton native.

"It was such a simple message that the agency came up with, and I think that is why it resonated with people so clearly. You could see the transformation happening – it was almost proof," said Staav.

With more than four million viewings on YouTube, women were watching and so was the advertising industry. Staav received the Grand Prix in the Film Lions category and the Cyber Grand Prix at Cannes 2007 with Dove "Evolution."

This year marked the 54th anniversary of the Cannes Lions international advertising festival. Participants are exposed to 25,000 ads in areas such as film, press, media and direct marketing.

"The feedback just keeps you on your toes. At no point do I feel satiated. You're always looking for the next thing to challenge you. All I care about is, when do I get to sink my teeth into something else really challenging," said Staav.

It was this passion that drove Staav to leave Edmonton at 19 and pursue the New Media program at Ryerson University in Toronto.

"Being Jewish, a director is not part of your vocabulary growing up. It's not like you're going to be a lawyer, doctor or a director. But when I came to Toronto, I realized people do this for a living and it looked amazing," said Staav.

While in Toronto, Staav began taking photographs of her friends' bands.

"The bands started to get bigger and the photos started getting published, and we were exposed to the world of VideoFACT," said Staav.

VideoFACT is a grants program that was established in 1984 to assist Canadian talent. It is funded entirely by the MuchMusic network.

"I started applying for grants, and I got them for a lot of artists. It was a lot of naiveté. I think about the little stick drawings I sent them and it makes me giggle," she said.

Staav began directing music videos, but financially she was still strained. During a low point, she even contemplated leaving the industry to pursue a law career.

"I had my LSAT books on top of my fridge until two or three years ago."

But it was the advice of a good friend that encouraged Staav to take a chance and send her demo reel to a few commercial companies.

"I started by sending my reel to an amazing company not with the expectation that I would get signed."

Her handcrafted label landed on the right person's desk at the right time and Staav was "whisked away on this whole other journey."

"As much as people say luck is two-thirds ambition and one-third elbow grease, I feel I had some fortune shine on me," said Staav, who recalls countless talented friends who are still struggling for a venue to ply their skills.

In addition to luck, Staav says she owes much of her success to her parents, Isaiah and Pnina, both of whom were born in Israel and later moved to New York City before settling in Canada.

"I can only speak from this position because they supported me through it. There are many years when you're an artist or filmmaker, when you're not making an impact. You need a supportive foundation without nudging."

Along with "Evolution," her commercial works include "Daughters" for Dove, "Hugging" for ALS, "Bad Hair Day" for Tetley and "Hose" for the YMCA.

"She is such a wonderful, smart, beautiful and confident person. She brings humanity to the business and her craft, and that shows in her work. The world is her oyster," said Eva Preger, executive producer of Soft Citizen, Staav's Canadian representation.

With the success of her commercials and short films, Staav is starting to think about writing screenplays.

"My family, the madness of Jewish schtick and the complexities of being a modern Jewess in a big city is always going to enter into my work," she said.

Staav is currently on location in Mexico City shooting a health commercial.

"You put yourself out there and you work hard and opportunities naturally open up. There are so many things I want to do… and still make it home [to Edmonton] for the High Holidays," she said.

Visitors from Baycrest are seen with some of the LITs and CITs at Camp Robin Hood this summer.

Baycrest residents go to camp

By LORNE BERGER
and SARAH POLAN
Special to The CJN

As the buses roll in through the camp grounds, the visitors from Baycrest look out of the windows and see the smiling faces of campers enjoying summer activities. The smiles are reflected on their own faces.

Camp Robin Hood and Baycrest have created a special bond over the last 15 years – a relationship that is rekindled twice every summer for the enjoyment of campers and seniors alike.

The relationship started when a parent of a Robin Hood camper suggested that a program integrating campers and Baycrest residents should be established. The idea has evolved to the point where the campers in the leader-in-training (LIT) and counsellor-in-training (CIT) program are now responsible for organizing the visits.

This year, the visitors were given a tour of the campsite and participated in an art activity.

Working with the campers all summer, the LITs and CITs develop a variety of skills including leadership, communication and teamwork. The visit from Baycrest is an opportunity for them to learn to work with and provide leadership for adults.

In turn, the seniors enjoy the experience of being with the children, and in some instances, get to relive the joy of their own childhood.

The visitors were welcomed by Larry and Pearl Bell, the senior directors (Bubbie and Zaide) of Camp Robin Hood.

Jewish studies major now at York

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

York University has long been known as a school with a large Jewish population, an impressive selection of Jewish studies courses, and a renowned Centre for Jewish Studies.

But starting next month, York will become one of only two Ontario universities to offer both a major and minor in Jewish studies. (The other is the University of Toronto.)

Previously, students could take Jewish-themed courses without being able to major or minor in Jewish studies.

"As the dimensions of the offerings in Jewish studies filled out, we increasingly began to think it made sense to mount a program, which is to say that now someone can major or minor in Jewish studies," said Eric Lawee, the Jewish studies program co-ordinator.

"One could have just taken a number of Jewish studies courses up until now. We had a certificate that attested to one's competence in Judaica, but now, one can actually do one's degree in Jewish studies. It is a new development we're excited about."

He added that York has had a long history of offering Jewish studies courses.

Its Centre for Jewish Studies, headed by Prof. Sara Horowitz, is a research hub that offers courses and organizes community programs related to Jewish learning. Lawee said he hopes both the centre and the new program will benefit from ongoing interaction.

Lawee also hopes the new program will fit into York's mandate of offering broad-based education.

"Students often associate Jewish studies with religious studies, and needless to say, we have a lot of interest in Judaism as a religion, but we also recognize that Jewish studies goes well beyond just the religious dimension. It can be Jewish literature, Jewish history, sociology of the Jewish community, Jewish music and so on," he said.

"Jewish studies shouldn't be seen in narrow terms, and we don't want to ghettoize Jewish studies as an academic discipline with no connections to the broader world of humanistic study."

Students who choose to major or minor in Jewish studies will study Judaism as a religion, but they will also have the opportunity to explore Jewish history, culture, sociology, languages, and fine arts from biblical times to the present.

"York has always prized broad-based education… But we think we'll be able to be focused enough to make sure there is competence in Jewish studies, but broad-based enough to make sure people are connecting to larger academic courses in the university," Lawee said.

He added that students who are already in the middle of their education at York and are interested in majoring in Jewish studies, switching into the program shouldn't be a problem.

"It is often the case that first-year students are undeclared when they come to university… even people who do declare their major very frequently find that what they thought was to their liking was not, so they found something they are more akin to, so they change majors… Our expectation will be that mostly first-year students either coming to York for the first time or who have already been here for a year will be the first cohort to go through the program."

Lawee said that although York has for many years offered a good selection of Jewish studies courses, he hopes the new program will give potential students yet another reason to come to York.

Queen's group backs boycott

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A Queen's University campus group has strongly criticized the head of the school for her opposition to a proposed boycott of Israeli academia.

Last week, the Queen's Coalition for Racial and Ethnic Diversity (QCRED), an anti-racist group dedicated to cultural awareness at the university, sent a letter to principal Karen Hitchcock objecting to her statement on the school's website denouncing a May decision by the British University and College Union (UCU) to hold a union-wide debate on whether to boycott Israeli academia.

An Aug. 15 report in the Toronto Star quoted a portion of the QCRED letter, which called Hitchcock's position a "mischaracterization and defamation of Queen's community members… who strongly oppose your stance."

The move by the UCU, Britain's largest teacher's union, has been met with widespread denunciation by most major Canadian universities.

In July, Hitchcock responded to the UCU announcement by calling it "antithetical to the core value of academic freedom, which is cherished by Queen's and other universities around the world."

She also stated that Queen's should also be added to the UCU boycott list if the union does not alter its "ill-advised course."

The Star report also quoted Queen's English professor Margaret Pappano, a faculty member of QCRED, who called Hitchcock's statement "blatantly political" and hypocritical because it was announced without prior debate.

"You can't be silent for years about what's gone on to Palestinian academic freedom and suddenly issue a statement of support for Israeli academic freedom without it having political connotations," Pappano said.

Lorinda Peterson, a spokesperson for the principal's office, confirmed that the QCRED letter had been received, but said Hitchcock was away.

Calls by The CJN to the coalition and Pappano were not returned.

Darfur refugees will be refused entry into Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government said Sunday that it would turn away refugees fleeing Darfur and seeking asylum in Israel, after it deported to Egypt for the first time almost 50 refugees that escaped the war-torn Sudanese region.

"The policy of returning back anyone who enters Israel illegally will pertain to everyone, including those from Darfur," said David Baker, a spokesperson for the Prime Minister's Office.

There are currently some 2,500 African refugees in Israel, including roughly 500 from Darfur.

The government has been struggling with what to do with the refugees, whose numbers have shot up in recent months to as many as 50 a day, according to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, apparently as word of job opportunities in Israel spread.

Israel Radio reported that PMO officials said Sunday night that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak agreed in a phone conversation Sunday that Israel would continue to return to Egypt Sudanese refugees who illegally entered it.

Olmert instructed the Immigrant Absorption Ministry on Sunday to absorb the Darfur refugees already in the country in Israel. "Those already in Israel will be allowed to stay," Baker said.

This decision, however, is only applicable to Darfur refugees already in Israel, and those who cross the border in the future will be immediately returned to Egypt.

Fighting between pro-government militias and rebels in the western Sudanese region of Darfur has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million since February 2003.

The refugees deported on Sunday were arrested last Friday evening as they tried to cross from Egypt into Israel, and were held for more than 24 hours at an Israel Defence Forces base in southern Israel before bussed back to Egypt on Sunday.

IDF figures showed that of the slightly more than 50 refugees deported, close to 50 were from Darfur. The rest were from the Ivory Coast and Somalia.

This is the first instance in which Israel has returned African refugees to Egypt, in accordance with an agreement with Mubarak at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit in 2005.

An government official said Egypt has agreed to treat the Darfur refugees well, but acknowledged it might send them back to Sudan. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the press.

Olmert said Sunday that he welcomes the move. "Mubarak has met his commitments, and this is the first sign of the prevention of infiltration from Egypt to Israel in a free manner."

Hadash MK Dov Khenin said in response that, "The expulsion is an inhumane act that violates international law."

The move comes about two weeks after 63 MKs signed a document urging the government to refrain from deporting Sudanese refugees to Egypt, amid reports of violent treatment the refugees face in Egypt. The signatories included Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Labor's Amir Peretz, Hadash's Dov Khenin and the National Religious Party's Effi Eitam.

Egyptian riot police violently cleared a refugee encampment in central Cairo in 2005, killing nearly 30 people.

Olmert, Abbas talks hit snag

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Talks between Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on a future Palestinian state are stuck on the issue of the Palestinian refugee problem.

Abbas is refusing to make significant concessions, government sources in Jerusalem told Ha'aretz.

They said Abbas and Olmert have in recent weeks been negotiating a new document on the core issues of forming a Palestinian state. The one-page document has five general clauses on central issues such as the permanent borders of the future Palestinian state, the question of jurisdiction over holy sites in Jerusalem and the Palestinian refugee problem.

But Olmert and Abbas have yet to agree on actual resolutions, the sources said, adding that the two leaders will meet at the end of the month to discuss the issues.

Both Israeli and Palestinian parties involved in the negotiations said the document was meant to be completed for the international peace conference U.S. President George W. Bush plans to hold in the fall.

Foreign diplomats said Abbas' aides told them that the international conference could not take place before the document is completed.

Sources at Olmert's office, however, suggested a different approach. "We're hoping to complete the document of principles before the conference, but the meeting does not depend on the document's completion," one said.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to arrive in Israel early next month to try to bridge the gap between the Palestinian and Israeli positions. Rice is reportedly determined to deal with core issues, as opposed to tactical problems such as Israeli checkpoints in the West Bank or concessions aimed at improving living conditions for the Palestinians.

If the document is completed in time, it will form the basis for further discussions at the conference, government sources said. Sources involved with the negotiations said the Palestinian side had already assembled a team to handle the talks.

Israeli diplomats have yet to set up such a delegation, but Jerusalem is currently forming a negotiating strategy for future talks with the Palestinians. The strategists are also enlisting international support and assistance for the talks.

The immediate goal will be to weaken Hamas, the Fatah rivals who seized control of the Gaza Strip this past June. This would be achieved through a boycott on Hamas amid attempts to bolster Abbas' West Bank government.

In its dealings with moderate Arab states, Israel is no longer demanding full recognition. Instead, Israel will seek a gradual rapprochement with the Arab League. Israel aims to secure the Arab League's support and assistance for the international conference.

Sources in Jerusalem said, however, that Arab diplomats are skeptical about the conference and fear that it has little chance of breaking the impasse in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Survivors get boost in benefits

help those who have fallen through the cracks and receive little government support in the form of the benefits received by most survivors who were in concentration camps or ghettos.

Some 8,000 survivors who, for bureaucratic reasons, have yet to receive a special government allotment will receive NIS 1,200 ($302) a month for the next two years. The government will try to convince Germany to provide these funds. If it does not succeed, it will increase the benefits paid by Israel to NIS 1,600 ($403) a month after the two years have passed.

In addition, some 7,000 survivors who receive reparations from a German fund established in the 1990s, and who subsist thanks to income supplements, will receive an annual grant of NIS 3,000 ($756). The government will also fund a centre that will inform survivors of their financial rights and help them receive the money due them.

The government, whose negotiating team was led by Prime Minister's Office director general Raanan Dinur, also agreed to symbolic gestures such as granting survivors a badge of appreciation on the occasion of Israel's upcoming 60th birthday. It will also establish a committee – half of whose members will be survivors and half ministerial directors – that will meet twice a year to discuss survivors' benefits and any related problems that might arise.

The government also committed to promote legislation recognizing the Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors as the representative group in any future negotiations with the government.

Israelis, Canadian Jews help Peru

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem said Sunday that $20,000 (US) had been sent to the Israeli Embassy in Lima in order to buy emergency provisions for victims of last week's earthquake.

Israeli President Shimon Peres instructed diplomats to ask the Peruvians what further help could be offered by Israel, which has organized major aid airlifts and search-and-rescue teams for foreign disaster zones in the past.

Peru is a popular destination for Israeli trekkers, but none were known to be among the hundreds of people killed by the Aug. 15 quake. More than 500 people have been reported killed, and more than 17,000 people have been displaced.

In Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has launched an emergency relief fund for those affected by the earthquake.

Proceeds will be distributed regardless of religion by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). The JDC is working with other disaster relief agencies in the regions to assess immediate needs.

The JDC has a century-old history of providing relief to those in need. It collected $19.6 million for the relief effort following the tsunami in Southeast Asia in 2004 and $800,000 for the Pakistani earthquake in 2005.

Israel Briefs

U.S. boosts grants

The Bush administration signed a deal to boost U.S. military grants to Israel by 25 per cent. U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns and Bank of Israel Governor Stanley Fischer met Aug. 16 in Jerusalem to seal a deal in which Israel will receive $30 billion (US) in defence aid over the coming decade. Israel, which currently gets $2.4 billion a year from Washington, sees the boost as vital to overhauling its armed forces after the Lebanon war and ahead of any showdown with arch-foe Iran. The new deal awaits congressional approval, and officials expect the first payout will take place in the 2009 fiscal year.

Nasrallah issues threat

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said Israel faces a "big surprise" that could shake the Middle East if it invades Lebanon again, the Turkish Daily News reported last week. Nasrallah, who made the comments in a speech to mark one year since Hezbollah's ceasefire with Israel, said his group has missiles that can reach deep into Israel. "Oh Zionists, if you think of launching a war on Lebanon, and I don't advise to do it," he told thousands of supporters at an Aug. 14 rally in Beirut. "I promise you a big surprise that could change the fate of war and the fate of the region."

Netanyahu re-elected

Benjamin Netanyahu easily won re-election as head of Israel's Likud Party last week. A final tally gave Netanyahu, the leader of Israel's parliamentary opposition, 73.2 per cent of the votes. His closest rival, pro-settler activist Moshe Feiglin, took 23.4 per cent.

Hamas vows victory

Hamas vowed to press the Palestinians' fight against Israel until it is destroyed. "Palestinians will fight Israel for generation upon generation until victory, and will yet get to dance at the Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem," Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister in the dismissed Palestinian Authority government, told a Gaza rally Aug. 16. "If Israel is not defeated in this generation, it will be in the next generation," he said.

Prof apologizes

An Israeli professor apologized for cursing troops who evicted settlers from disputed West Bank properties. Hillel Weiss, a professor of Jewish studies at Bar-Ilan University, was in Hebron during this month's eviction of two squatter families and appeared on national media calling for the death of a senior army commander involved in the operation. The remarks outraged top Israeli brass and politicians, prompting police to probe whether Weiss had incited violence. On Aug. 13, Weiss said he sent a letter of apology to the military chief of staff and that he never intended for his invective to be taken personally. "I said that I was ashamed of my curses, that this was a terrible lapse," Weiss said. He said his daughter was among the settlers removed from buildings in Hebron to which Palestinians claim ownership, and that he was outraged by what he described as excessive force used by police and troops. "I was thrown out of my daughter's house along with her and the babies, very forcibly," he said. "I came out full of anger and fury."

Hebrew U gives refund

Hebrew University compensated a man whose attendance was scuppered by World War II. On Aug. 14, Hebrew U gave Baruch Kaplan, 85, a cheque for $3,800 (US), a symbolic sum that today would cover two years of tuition. The Polish-born Kaplan enrolled to study chemistry at in 1939, and his father paid in advance. War broke out, and Kaplan escaped the Nazi onslaught, but his family was killed. He would later study sciences in Moscow, becoming a renowned scholar, before making aliyah. He said he plans to spend the cash on tuition for one of his great-granddaughters.

Jews help build youth village in Rwanda

By JUSTIN SULSKY
JTA

NEW YORK — Anne Heyman heard a statistic nearly two years ago that would change her life: 15 per cent of Rwandan children are orphans due to the 1994 genocide in which 800,000 people were murdered in 100 days.

"I couldn't let go of this notion," Heyman said. "There was really no future for Rwanda."

Heyman, a non-practising attorney born in South Africa, has spent the past two years pushing for the creation of a Jewish-sponsored institution in Rwanda to help tackle the dire situation.

Her determination is paying off – last Friday she attended a groundbreaking ceremony in Rwamagana, Rwanda, for the Agahozo Shalom Youth Village, which will serve 500 impoverished orphans.

Agahozo – Kinyarwandan for "the place where tears are dried" – is modelled after the Youth Aliyah Village of Yemin Orde, which was founded in 1953 and initially housed Holocaust orphans.

To help realize her vision, Heyman turned to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Israeli officials, including many Ethiopian Israelis, have also been involved in the formulation of the youth village.

"We will strive to the extent that it's possible to create a normal environment," Heyman told JTA in a phone interview from her hotel room in Rwanda. "As far as I know, it's unprecedented."

The JDC is promising that the village will provide Rwandan orphans, many of them infected with HIV and suffering from AIDS, with a "safe, structured environment with a rich community life where children are exposed to all elements of parental and familial normalcy, thereby providing wholeness in the wake of destruction."

"[Jews] have a collective experience with the Rwandans, having come through genocide," said Will Recant, the JDC's assistant executive vice-president. "We're very much invested in the long-term sustainable commitment to make this happen."

Heyman said she hopes that students from all over Rwanda will come to the village and impart what they have learned to their home communities when they graduate.

"The effect of this project will be felt over the country," Heyman said.

Recant said numerous high-ranking political and business leaders support the school, which is slated to open in 2009.

"We've been received at the highest levels of the Rwandan government," he said.

Recant and Heyman both said they hope eventually to build similar villages in other parts of Africa.

Heyman said in order to provide the greatest benefit, the JDC is trying to hire as many qualified Rwandan people and companies as possible. But because of the shortage of qualified Rwandan teachers, she said, some positions will be filled from outside the country.

Recant, who has extensive experience leading the JDC's non-sectarian humanitarian programs, said those not often exposed to Jews and Israelis gain a great appreciation for them when they see the work being done by Jewish groups.

"The work itself speaks volumes," he said. "They see we have no horns."

"I've never felt more warmly welcomed as a Jew" than at any other time while doing humanitarian work, Heyman added.

Lutherans move on Israel boycott

CHICAGO — The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America has taken a step toward a partial boycott of Israeli goods.

At its 2007 Churchwide Assembly in Chicago earlier this month, the church's top legislative authority urged "consideration" of economic options, including the refusal to buy Israeli products or invest in activities in Israeli settlements, the Jerusalem Post reported. The church also resolved to work toward a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and for investment in the Palestinian Authority.

The assembly rejected a call for divestiture from Israel.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center blasted the assembly's "mixed message" of rejecting divestiture but "studying" a boycott.

"This marks the first time a mainline American Protestant church has moved toward a possible boycott of Israel," said the Center's associate dean, Rabbi Abraham Cooper.

"ELCA delegates would have made a stronger contribution to the quest for peace and justice in the Holy Land had they also raised the ransacking of Christian places of worship and [the] recent forced conversion of a Christian professor in Gaza, as well as the unrelenting targeting of Israeli civilian communities by Palestinian Qassam rockets," Cooper said.

U.K. profs warn of damaging ties

LONDON — A number of British academics have renewed their plea for the immediate recall of a proposed academic boycott of Israel.

The added urgency comes in the wake of a full-page ad threatening a retaliatory boycott of British institutions that appeared in the Aug. 8 issue of the New York Times. The ad was signed by more than 300 American university and college presidents.

Prof. Mark Pepys, head of the department of medicine at the University of London's Hampstead Campus and a member of the University and College Union sponsoring the proposed boycott, warned that British academic institutions must distance themselves from any boycott of Israeli academia or risk seriously damaging ties with U.S. colleges and universities.

A letter to be distributed to British universities by the joint chairs of the Stop the Boycott campaign will request each institution to clarify its position on the boycott. Universities such as Cambridge and Oxford have come out in opposition.

In the letter, Pepys noted that "American academia, with its depth, breadth and scale, has enormous impact in the U.K. at all levels of academic life."

Later, he said, "There is now an immediate imperative for all British universities to take an equally rigorous and unequivocal public stand so that they are not tainted by association with those individuals who propose a boycott."

Pepys said before even more damage is done to British universities and the country's reputation, universities should announce their opposition to the boycott.

Jeremy Newmark, chief executive of the Jewish Leadership Council and joint chair of Stop the Boycott Campaign said, "We will be writing to every university in the country urging them to clarify their position so that they do not become unfairly associated with the boycott."

He applauded the clear rejection of the boycott by Oxford and others, and said, "It is time for every major U.K. campus to declare themselves boycott-free zones."

Adaptation of Michaels' Fugitive Pieces opens film fest

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Jeremy Podeswa on the set of Fugitive Pieces

It's always an honour to have your film open the prestigious Toronto International Film Festival.

But for local filmmaker Jeremy Podeswa, the opening at the festival on Sept. 6 of his adaptation of Anne Michaels' much-praised novel Fugitive Pieces will also remind people that he's not just the A-list TV director he's become in recent years.

While Podeswa's first two feature films, Eclipse and The Five Senses, have hardly been minor accomplishments, Podeswa's renown of late has stemmed from his helming of such critically acclaimed, controversial and often cutting- edge cable television shows, including Dexter, Rome, Nip/Tuck and Six Feet Under.

"I kind of feel like I have two parallel careers in a way," says the 45-year-old Torontonian over the phone from Los Angeles, where he is shooting a new episode of Showtime's Dexter, "one as an independent filmmaker and one as a television director.

"They do dovetail with each other very well, but it's very important for me to sustain that other career of mine, which is really where I started, as an independent filmmaker."

In fact, when he began shooting feature films, Podeswa had never even contemplated working in television. "I never imagined that I was going to be directing television, but then I also never imagined that television would be so interesting," he says.

Nevertheless, he is happy to be making movies again and excited by having met the challenge of adapting the complex Fugitive Pieces to the screen. The film tells the moving story of a young Polish-Jewish boy, Jakob, who is rescued from the Holocaust by a Greek man and brought, first to Greece, and then to Toronto after the war. There Jakob makes a new life for himself, while trying to deal with the pain of his scarred past.

Podeswa, however, doesn't consider the movie to be a Holocaust film.

"It's more a film about loss and memory and history and how we deal with the past – the vehicle that she [Anne Michaels] uses to tell that story is [about] someone who has been through the World War II experience. But what I really appreciated about the book, among many other things, is the fact that it's really universal in what it's dealing with," he says.

"It's really about a lot of different things, and it's not specifically about one historical experience. That being said, if I hadn't read Fugitive Pieces, I'm not sure that I would have touched the subject in any way at all. If I hadn't found the vehicle that dealt with it in a way that I thought was truly original and hadn't been done, I wouldn't have."

Coincidentally, the somewhat similarly themed Emotional Arithmetic, directed by Paolo Barzman, adapted from the late Toronto author Matt Cohen's novel, is closing the Toronto International Film Festival.

Podeswa admits that another attraction to the project was its relation to his father's experiences during the war. The Polish-born Yehuda (Julius) Podeswa also lost his whole family in the Holocaust.

"In some ways, there are parallels between his story and the story of Jakob in the book, but it's really not so much the specifics of their experiences but more the issues that it raises, the general thematic things that come of that experience [which] Anne deals with very sensitively [in the book]," Podeswa says.

Michaels, who lives in Toronto, has been very supportive of his project, says Podeswa, adding that he feels he has done justice to her book.

"So far in test screenings that we've done, people who knew the book have responded very, very strongly to the film. I think people who love the book are going to really love the movie."

Of course, any film that touches on the horrors of the Holocaust, even in the non-explicit way that Fugitive Pieces does, will be have to contend with the label of "Jewish" film and by extension, its creator will be tagged as a "Jewish" filmmaker.

Podeswa knows that. "I have a strong feeling about identity politics. I think people are a lot of different things. Your gender, your religion, your nationality, all kinds of things come into play as to what kind of filmmaker you are," he says.

"So I'm a lot of things, not just a Jewish filmmaker, but I am also Jewish and I think that certainly has a role to play in me wanting to make this film very badly and feeling it was an important film to make. I embrace the label [of Jewish filmmaker], but I'm not limited by that label."

Fugitive Pieces will be released commercially this fall.

Ashkenaz presents klezmer/Yiddish concert at Earl Bales

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A free concert featuring internationally renowned klezmer and Yiddish musicians takes place in Toronto's Earl Bales Park on Aug. 28.

Performers from Israel and the former Soviet Union take to the stage at the park's Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre for the event, which is part of the Ashkenaz Festival's year-round programming.

"The idea with the concert is outreach for Ashkenaz programming, particularly to the northern regions of the city, where many Russians and Israelis reside," says Eric Stein, Ashkenaz's artistic director.

"Last year's event was an unbelievable success… and we hope to create something as spectacular as it's been in the past."

At the 2006 event, the concert drew more than 2,200 people show to a venue that seats 1,500.

Stein notes this year's concert, titled East Meets West, will showcase a folksy, traditional style with a mix of bands, virtuosos and singers.

The all-star group of musicians includes Oy Division, an Israel-based klezmer band with youthful, punk influences; the duo of Efim Chorny and Susanna Ghergus from the former Soviet Union; Yiddish singer Vira Lozinsky; clarinet virtuoso Alexander Danilov, who is the leader of the Presidential Orchestra of Moldova; and Sasha Luminsky, a star accordion player originally from Ukraine who now lives in Toronto.

Aside from Luminsky, all the performers are making their Canadian debuts.

"Between them all, we'll be hearing an interesting and unique repertoire performed by top-notch musicians," says Stein.

Over the last three decades, Yiddish and klezmer music has experienced a renaissance across Europe and North America.

In the cities of former Soviet republics where significant Jewish populations still live, Yiddish performers are a burgeoning breed.

"Under communism, [Jewish] identity and nationality was suppressed in the former Soviet Union. But since the fall of communism, there's been an incredible renaissance and flowering of interest in this culture," says Stein.

"People are trying to recover what was lost and suppressed."

The situation in Israel has generally been different.

In an effort to embrace Hebrew and nurture a culture linked with its Middle Eastern context, Israel has ignored the Ashkenaz roots of a large portion of its population.

The tide does appear to be turning as a younger generation of Israelis are discovering the richness and dynamism of Yiddish culture.

"For me personally, connecting with this music has made me more tuned into my cultural identity," says Stein.

"And it's great, high-quality music."

The next Ashkenaz Festival takes place at Harbourfront Centre on Labour Day weekend in 2008 and features performers from as many as 10 countries, working in music, film, theatre, dance, literature, crafts and visual arts.

Admission to East Meets West is free, but tickets are required. They are available at the Zukerman box office from noon on Aug. 28. Doors open 5 p.m., concert starts at 7 p.m. There is no reserved seating. For more information, call 416-635-2883, ext. 150, or visit www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Names in the News: The U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League has honoured American conductor James Conlon with its Crystal Globe Award for his efforts in championing the works of composers silenced by the Third Reich.

"With its systematic suppression of Jewish musicians, artists and writers, the Third Reich silenced two generations of composers and, with them, an entire musical landscape," said the influential conductor and musical director, who has worked to raise public awareness about composers whose lives and compositions were affected by the Holocaust, by programming their music throughout North America and Europe.

Little Birdie
Cinematic Way
(Local Distributor)

A fusion of bluegrass, folk and country might be the last thing you'd expect from a young Jewish singer from Montreal.

But that's exactly what you get with Little Birdie's debut disc Cinematic Way.

Led by singer-songwriter Orit Shimoni, Little Birdie is one of the star bands emerging from Montreal's vibrant alt-country scene. Joined by Ottawa native Andre Kirchoff, the band has recently performed in showcases in Montreal and Toronto, including at Canadian Music Week, and at the recent Mariposa Folk Festival in Orillia.

Shimoni, who wrote the 11 songs on the CD, started playing while attending high school in Calgary, before spending six years in Jerusalem and then moving to Montreal.

This CD showcases her songwriting talents. The country-fused acoustic rock and folk songs remind me of Neil Young, Blue Rodeo and Cowboy Junkies, although they're hard to pigeonhole.

The band says it's influenced by such versatile performers as Leonard Cohen, Gillian Welch and Neko Case.

Lyrically, the songs run the gamut from love and heartbreak (Foolish Thing, It's OK) to the spiritual (The Temple, Oh Abraham).

Standouts are Consider This, a fast-paced, melodic arrangement that is very radio friendly, The Falcon and the rockier The Temple.

But don't take my word for it. Listen to some of the songs at www.myspace.com/weelittlebirdie.

The CD is available at cdnow, amazon.ca and at Archambault and Music World in Montreal.

PUTUMAYO PRESENTS
ISRAEL

Various Artists
Israel
Putumayo World Music

The Israeli music scene has always been a vibrant one. This is especially true today as decades of immigrants have made Israel one of the most culturally diverse countries in the world.

Next month, Putumayo World Music is releasing Israel, a collection of 12 songs of contemporary Israeli music. From Yemenite chants to Jamaican reggae, this collection represents some of the diverse sounds of modern Israel.

Among the more notable artists are David Broza, the popular singer who makes his home in Israel and New Jersey; Idan Raichel, one of the standouts on this album, who's become one of the most inspiring success stories in Israeli popular music; and Tea Packs, who gained notoriety as a controversial choice for the 2007 Eurovision Song Contest.

Other standouts include Sheva, a group of seven Jewish and Muslim men (not to be confused with the Canadian singer of the same name) who fuse reggae and world music, and my favourite discovery on this album, Amal Murkus, a Palestinian living in Galilee, whose beautiful voice soars on the melodic Arabic tune Ta'alu.

Overall this is a good sampling of Israeli music, however, I can think of at least a couple artists missing here such as Noa and Aviv Geffen.

Israel should be in record stores in late September. To find out more about Putumayo releases, visit www.putumayo.com.

The Simpsons is Cohen's dream job

With 15 full-time writers and five part-timers, The Simpsons has the largest writing staff of any television show.

"It's demanding – with 22 episodes a season and each taking nine to 10 months to complete – there's a fair bit of work," Cohen says.

The Simpsons is Cohen's dream job. He got an MBA from York University in 1992 and went to work at a film distribution company in Toronto, where he moved up the ladder from sales to vice-president in five years.

But writing was his passion. With no work in sight, he headed to Hollywood to write scripts.

"I was here in L.A., extremely bored in my corporate gig working for Turner Broadcasting in the ad sales department. It was very difficult to land a writing job," Cohen says, "but I met Kathy Griffin, the comedian.

Simpsons* writer Joel Cohen [Sheryl Wachtel photo]

"When we became friends, she hired me to write for her for award shows. At the time, she was working on Suddenly Susan, so she helped me get the job as writer on that show," .

One year later, Suddenly Susan was cancelled and Cohen was out of work.

But not for long. The well-known Simpsons' writer George Meyer is the boyfriend of Cohen's former boss at Suddenly Susan, Maria Semple.

"She [Semple] gave me a really good recommendation, having worked together for a year, and then 13 days later, I started here at Simpsons and they've regretted it ever since."

Hardly. Cohen is responsible for some popular Simpsons episodes, including Today I Am a Clown – Krusty's Bar Mitzvah, with guest stars Mr. T and Jackie Mason.

"Mr. T was phenomenal, very cool. At one point, I was coaching him to read Hebrew – whispering in his ear," Cohen recalls. "When he said the Hebrew back, it was the most religious experience I've ever had."

Cohen's writing is inspired by situations in his life.

"I have kids, so a lot that happens I translate into the writing, like the bar mitzvah episode. Some element is taken from my own life, but Mr. T wasn't at my bar mitzvah. I invited him, but he didn't show."

Cohen attributes The Simpsons' success to its appeal to a wide audience.

"It's a cartoon, so younger audiences enjoy that. Then I'm always impressed with the jokes, where some involve physical humour of Homer banging himself in the head that both kids and adults respond to. There are references to 16th-century literature in certain segments," he says.

"There's certainly something for everybody – some goes over people's heads and others hit right on."

What's new on The Simpsons next season?

"If I know Canadian Jews, they'll want to know about our great guest stars. We have Steven Colbert, Stevie Wonder, Jack Black, Glenn Close, Placido Domingo, Jon Stewart, Dan Rather," Cohen says.

"I'm sure I'm neglecting hundreds of millions of others. There are tons of great episodes, really funny ones with great guest stars, and it's better than ever."

A sociological portrait of Orthodox Judaism in the U.S.

Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Jewish Orthodoxy* by Samuel C. Heilman, University of California Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thirty years ago, American sociologist Marshall Sklare expressed amazement that Orthodox Judaism in the United States had not yet withered away.

"Orthodox Judaism at the dawn of the 21st century has decidedly not melted completely away," observed Sklare, who had predicted its demise. "Orthodoxy has refused to assume the role of invalid."

Indeed, he added, Orthodoxy had become a growing force.

Sklare had reason to believe that Orthodoxy was in a state of decline. During the Holocaust, Orthodox communities and their synagogues and institutions had been destroyed by the Nazis and their local collaborators.

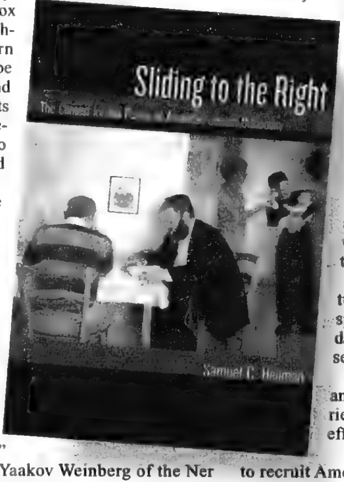
Rather than succumbing to despair, the survivors regrouped and turned further inward, having concluded that the values of western secular society were worthless and untrustworthy.

For Orthodox Jews, the only constant was Judaism in its traditional form, with its set of unchanging and rigid requirements, codes and obligations.

But in recent years, American Orthodoxy has evolved to the point where such certitudes evoke a measure of debate and disagreement, a development that is echoed in Canada.

As City University of New York sociologist Samuel C. Heilman writes in the paperback edition of Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Jewish Orthodoxy, the Orthodox community, comprising about 12 per cent of American Jewry, is torn by a schism of some significance.

Heilman, an expert on the topic, says that this ideological confrontation pits haredim against accommodationists. In his view, they are engaged in a struggle "to define the essence of the movement authoritatively."



The accommodationists represent a majority of Orthodox Jews in the United States. Otherwise referred to as modern Orthodox Jews, they subscribe to the belief that they can and should adapt to certain aspects of American society while remaining steadfastly loyal to Jewish traditions, law and customs.

The haredim view the modern world not as an opportunity but as a threat and seek to keep it at arm's length.

As Heilman puts it, "Here the goal is not to fit Orthodoxy to the surrounding culture but rather to ensure that all insiders conform… no matter how retrograde it may seem. Here the received wisdom is that yesterday is superior to today…"

As enunciated by Rabbi Yaakov Weinberg of the Ner Israel Yeshiva in Baltimore, the haredim embrace the position that they are defined by a sense of "otherness" that cannot be bridged.

The modernists, as exemplified by Rabbi Norman Lamm, one of the former presidents of Yeshiva University, hold that Orthodox Judaism should be adaptive, based on an equally firm commitment to Torah and the values of contemporary culture.

However this battle plays out, Heilman is convinced that the Orthodox community at large has moved to the right, driven by several imperatives.

They believe that American culture has declined, given the sexual revolution, the trend toward intermarriage and the challenge to authority.

"To many Orthodox Jews, including the modernists, the liberal tradition suddenly seemed dangerous, and they recoiled from it, even though they did not abandon the idea of higher education and a professional career," says Heilman. "It really did not take too much to get Orthodox Jews culturally anxious. Even the modernists among them were after all fundamentally conservative in their outlook."

The shift to the right, Heilman states, also turns on decisions by families to bestow responsibility for their children's education to day schools and yeshivas, which are more conservative than secular schools.

The emergence of study in Israeli yeshivas and women's seminaries as an essential experience in the Orthodox way of life has had an effect as well.

As early as the 1950s, yeshivas in Israel tried to recruit American Orthodox Jews in the hope of using them as foot soldiers to combat secular culture.

Very few Americans joined these programs, but in the wake of the Six Day War, they began to catch on.

Heilman estimates that about two-thirds of New York day school graduates attend such programs today. In some schools, the figure is closer to 90 per cent.

These programs, which are intrinsically right-wing in outlook, promote and exalt the controversial Jewish settlement drive in the territories and universally regard settlers as the new Jewish heroes.

Haredim send their children to Israel, too, and their youth mark their identity by external symbols.

Heilman writes: "Among the boys, this might include donning the black hat, white shirt and dark jacket that (has) become the uniform of the haredi yeshiva or, in the case of the national religious yeshivas, the knit yarmulke."

Women committed to such Orthodoxy took to wearing long sleeves and extra-long skirts.

According to Heilman, graduates of haredi yeshivas in Israel hew to certain postures of prayer. They display piety by prolonging prayers and tend to gesticulate during worship.

In general, Heilman seems in no doubt that Orthodox Judaism is prospering.

Forty per cent of the synagogues in the United States are Orthodox in orientation, and in New York City, the proportion rises to 57 per cent.

Further, Orthodox Jews have assumed leadership positions in many top-flight Jewish organizations, including the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations.

Historically, Orthodox Jews had the lowest per capita average income, but of late, they have become wealthier.

Heilman's discussion of kosher food, the staple of the Orthodox diet, is interesting. In a word, the billion dollar kosher food industry is booming, with more than 41,000 kosher-certified products currently in the American retail market.

"All this has led to an infusion of confidence and assertiveness in American Orthodoxy, in contrast to the timidity that often characterized it in the past," he notes.

In closing, Heilman argues that Orthodox Jews, like America itself, will continue to reinvent themselves in the face of modernity, secularization and technological advances.

But even he cannot divine the future. "Today, frum leads to frummer, but tomorrow – who knows?"

New Baycrest boss puts focus on clients, research

Baycrest's new president and CEO visits with Alex Ship and Marguerite Markowski, two Apotex nursing home residents who are enjoying an afternoon of watercolour painting in the Art Studio.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. William Reichman, new president and chief executive officer of Baycrest, has a very specific goal: to make the institution the best in the world for research and for care of the elderly.

"I want Baycrest to become the Sloan-Kettering [Cancer Centre] of what we do – bringing good science and excellent care together to maximize the well-being of the aged all over the world," he said.

His particular focus (although by no means the only one) is to help people with dementia, Alzheimer's and other mental disorders – hardly surprising, since he is a psychiatrist and an authority on mental health care.

Reichman was formerly professor of psychiatry and neurology at the Robert Wood Johnson Medical School in New Jersey, where he also served as senior associate dean for clinical affairs and president of the Robert Wood Johnson University Medical Group.

He said he left this prestigious post because of Baycrest's reputation in the aging field, in long-term care and in dementia.

"Globally, everyone knows about Baycrest. There are few places like it, that combine a strong research element with excellent clinical care."

The issue, Reichman said, is how to intervene to maximize the functioning of the individual, physically, psychologically, spiritually.

Drugs, while important, should not be the only means of doing this. "For example," he said, "we have lots of medications for heart disease, but we know that exercise and diet are also vital."

Of course, he said, any facility is only as good as the people who work there.

"We want to work with the best and the brightest. We already have some of the world's best scientists and clinicians. But we want to seize every opportunity to recruit other people to bridge the gap between the clinician and the researcher."

Reichman said he plans to work with community leaders to get the resources needed to fulfil this goal.

In his less than two months in his new position, he has worked hard to acclimatize himself. He has had informal meetings with staff and residents. He takes time to do what he calls walkabouts, where he literally walks around the halls, seeing what is going on, talking to staff, residents and families he meets, and generally making himself known to them and getting them to know him.

He also uses a structured approach, meeting in small groups with housekeeping staff, nurses and doctors.

"I go floor by floor, meeting the residents and, with their permission, greeting them at meals and visiting them [by invitation] in their rooms."

What he especially enjoys, he said, is that many greet him and share their life experiences with him.

The term "permission" is significant to him. "I don't want to intrude on their personal times, for instance at lunch or while they are in their rooms. I respect their privacy and dignity. After all, Baycrest provides a home, not just health care."

Since he has been in Toronto for such a short time, he is still waiting for his Ontario medical licence. Once it comes, he said, "I want to to see patients, to consult, not only in psychiatric matters, but in any aspect I am asked, and to work in the memory disorders clinic."

Reichman is conscious of the non-medical aspects of Baycrest life – the high proportion of Holocaust survivors, the importance of maintaining faith traditions, the results of illness and increasing frailty.

"It's not just that we can't fulfil our own expectations, not just that we don't want to be a burden, but that we feel we have lost our role in life."

He stressed that Baycrest must never lose sight of the absolute imperative to always put the needs of the residents at the forefront of whatever happens.

Reichman said he is pleasantly surprised at the warmth with which he has been welcomed here, by the medical community generally at Baycrest and by people in the community.

Child's Yiddish book survives over 75 years

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

When Sarah Pantel née Spungin arrived in Halifax on the freighter Roussillon in 1929, she brought a small piece of her Latvian childhood with her.

An autograph book signed by her classmates and teachers wished the nine-year-old well on her journey. Mostly written in Yiddish, the book is filled with "Yiddishisms," whose deeper meanings or pithiness are often lost in translation.

Pantel emigrated to Canada from a small Latvian shtetl called Liva Mussa with her parents and three siblings, leaving pogroms and other terrors behind to settle in Montreal. There she met and married Alec Pantel and, a few years later, started a family.

צום אנדיינקונג.

שטענדיג זאג דעם אמת

און ווייט פון ליגן.

פון דיין חברטה אסתר ליווין.

1928 29/V

Translation: As a remembrance/Always speak the truth/Be far from falsehood./From your friend/Esther Levin/May 29, 1928.

While Terry was helping her pack for the move, Sarah asked her to root through a bedroom drawer and find a pad that looked like it contained a bunch of scribbles. She told her daughter to make sure it was not thrown out.

The small rectangular book is not more than eight inches wide by four inches long. It has about 15 pages of signatures, with handwriting that is impressive for children. Many of the pages have Yiddish anecdotes and most wish Sarah good luck on her journey. Some pages are decorated with sticker-like transfers.

The book, its pages yellowed but still legible, is now in the hands of Jamie Finiffter, Sarah's grandson. Finiffter, 38, wants to publish as many names as possible that are in the book so that anyone with a connection to it or the small Latvian shtetl can come forward and take part in this living snapshot in time.

"My main concern was just to get those names out there," he said.

"I didn't want this beautiful piece of history just sitting in our house, as much as it is an attachment to my grandmother."

Finiffter contacted a Yiddish teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School who, along with her husband, orally translated the book so Finiffter could hear the gist of what it contained.

"It's just an amazing piece of history and when you think about everything that has happened since [1929], I can't even imagine the horror they went through before… I just want to know if any of them had made it out, and if not, this is probably one of the only living testimonies to these kids."

Finiffter said that little is known about his grandmother's shtetl life. While her father was the town's kosher butcher, and the family lived a nice life, pogroms made circumstances difficult.

He said that Sarah was highly affected by her past – for instance, her hands shook from the time she was a young child.

As well, her mother, Goldie Spungin, had screaming fits every night until the end of her life and couldn't be comforted. Terry Pantel once saw her grandmother's face during one of these episodes and said that the only thing she could think of when she saw it was Edvard Munch's painting The Scream .

"It's weird – it's not Shoah, it's not the Holocaust, it's a part of life that just before everything fell apart, here were these people just trying to live their lives," Finiffter said about what the book encapsulates.

"It's just a very unique snapshot of a life, of a lifestyle, that's long gone off the face of our earth. To me that's a very unique thing, and to me that's very precious. I can't even put a value on it for what it is to me emotionally and otherwise, but it deserves to be seen."

Finiffter has donated the autograph book to the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, where head archivist Adaire Klein has taken an interest in it and will make sure the pages are translated.

He personally delivered the book to Los Angeles at the end of July to ensure its safe arrival.

"They'll scan it properly and they'll make a concerted effort to get it out there," Finiffter said.

He said Yad Vashem, the national Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, has expressed interest in the book and wants copies of its pages.

Anyone with any connection to the names in the book, from which more pictures will be posted to The CJN's website at www.cjnews.com, can contact Jamie Finiffter at 416-598-0777.

Israeli duo reaches semi-finals at Montreal tennis open

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

Israeli doubles players Jonathan Erlich, left, and Andy Ram celebrate a win at the Rogers Cup in Montreal.

MONTREAL – The Israeli Davis Cup doubles tennis team of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram may want to consider Montreal as their second home, judging by their outstanding play at the Rogers Cup Canadian Open, held earlier this month at Jarry Tennis Stadium.

Although Erlich and Ram didn't match their runner-up finish in doubles the last time they competed in Montreal in 2005, the duo played superb tennis to finish as semi-finalists.

Erlich and Ram, seeded sixth, started with a gift of a walkover win when the team of Rafael Nadal and Lleyton Hewitt withdrew due to their success in singles play.

Erlich and Ram then upset the second-seeded team of Jonas Bjorkman and Max Mirnyi 6-1, 7-5 with excellent net play and a high percentage of first serves won. The Israeli duo broke the second seeds twice in the first set, then followed with a crucial break in the 12th game of the second set to win the match.

But they couldn't follow up with a win in the semi-finals.

The Israelis were broken twice in both the first and second sets in losing to the third-seeded team of Paul Hanley and Kevin Ullyett 6-2, 6-3.

"We would have loved to finish as strong in Montreal as we did in 2005, but it was not meant to be," said Ram after the semi-final loss. "Jonathan and I loved the support we get in Canada. We will definitely be back and hope to win in Canada in 2008."

Erlich and Ram have now finished as semi-finalists or better in three of the past four Rogers Cup tournaments held in Montreal and Toronto.

Overall, they have finished as finalists three times in 2007, and they've raised their ranking from 18th to 17th in doubles tennis rankings after their semi-final finish in Montreal.

Since they started playing together in 2003, Erlich and Ram have won 10 doubles titles.

Both immigrated to Israel as children from South America: Erlich, 30, was born in Argentina, and Ram, 27, in Uruguay. Both grew up loving soccer, but ended up playing tennis because of their success winning junior tournaments in Israel.

"Andy and I thought it would be fun to play together five years ago, and we enjoyed each other's company, which is one of the many reasons we play so well together," Erlich said.

Ram also excels in playing with female partners and is the first Israeli to win two mixed doubles Grand Slam titles. In June, Ram teamed with Nathalie Dechy of France to win the French Open mixed doubles title. In 2006, Ram teamed with Vera Zvonareva of Russia to win the Wimbledon mixed doubles championship.

"It meant so much to me to win both the French and Wimbledon titles because I represent Israel. The country gets positive publicity for my achievements. I received congratulations from [Israeli] Prime Minister [Ehud] Olmert and many telegrams from friends around the world," said Ram.

"Andy and I were so overjoyed and surprised to win the French Open mixed doubles title," said Dechy, who competed at the Toronto Rogers Cup this year.

"Andy only played with me because his regular partner, Zvonareva, was injured. Andy is very good at the net, and we really jelled as a team. He really showed how good he is in doubles by winning titles with different partners."

Ram had 600 guests to celebrate his wedding to Shiri Zlotikman in Tel Aviv last September. Erlich was his best man.

"I have every reason to enjoy life and I never thought that I would have so much success in tennis. I am grateful to Jonathan and my mixed doubles partners for the many titles we won," Ram said.

Erlich and Ram hope to win the U.S. Open men's doubles title next month in New York, where Ram will also be seeking a third mixed doubles title.

Nevada bachelor blues

ALMOST FAMOUS
By Jacob Medjuck

It's only 336 days until summer camp! Fantastic. Unless, like myself, you find yourself not at camp anymore, to which I offer you a sombre nod as you continue from inside a cubicle to mark off on your Royal Bank calendar the number of days until you die.

Mother Nature, I've decided, must have a devious but sympathetic relative, whom we'll call Uncle Matrimony, who has created a clever series of training-wheel activities to shuttle us into adulthood, while the seasons of our lives go round.

Bridging our school years with summer camp was a genius move: it provides emotional support from many and emotional assaults from many others. Camp. Not ideal, but perfect; several hundred training wheels around us.

Then, as we move through high school, university and away from camp, layers of training wheels peel off. We are whittled down to our last support trusses, and we make our way into the workforce.

Busy, stressed and nostalgic, I often find myself longing for the days of the grand group assembly. And that's usually when Uncle Matrimony calls with the promise of forthcoming bachelor parties.

A series of events, the schematics of which no collection of commandments or mitzvahs will protect you from, follows – the "dark arts" and crafts – stuff they don't prepare you for but still involving paint, Popsicle sticks and tying knots.

And, is it still considered tzedakah if you tuck the folded bill into a g-string?

Women aren't left out either, as this month's bride I'm told has no less than four pre-wedding shower events. That's a lot of crystal bowls and furry handcuffs.

Last year, I flew down to Las Vegas for what can only be described as an "Area 52"-like event, the bachelor-inspired transgressions of which are kept so guardedly secret that it would make the quiet activities of Nevada-based neighbour Area 51 seem public and petty knowledge. I'm permitted, however, to share in that upon my late arrival Friday afternoon.

The best man was in a hospital, having suffered a brain bleed, the victim of a surprise dispute. That itself, though serious enough, is not where sanity collapsed. The best man, it turned out, was just sorry to miss out on two interim days, and joined us again Saturday night.

So eager was he not to miss out that he offered this comforting sentiment while climbing half naked from his hospital bed, "It's all right boys," he said. "I have an MRI machine where I'm doing my residency. I'll just scan myself at home." His eyeballs, looking a shade of cherry tomato, suggested that the matter should be addressed sooner. All said, the comment seemed far too casually absorbed by our travelling caravan of radiologists and lawyers. Ah, for the company of spinster Jews.

Slowly but defiantly, these events will sour us of training-wheel needs and point us toward parenthood on our own steam.

Rashi, who comments on everything else, fails to address that while Moses had several wives, nothing is revealed about his several bachelor parties. If the adage, "What happens in Sinai, stays in Sinai," holds true, then it's probably a more accurate explanation as to why Moses was denied entry into the Holy Land. I wouldn't be surprised if the participants in our Vegas debacle aren't stopped at the U.S. border for years to come.

Even so, warned and wary, I'm still likely to accept an occasional outing with the boys, though I've learned to say Tfilat Haderech (the prayer for travel) while grabbing my coat.

In the dwindling days of summer, I wish you all wellness and refreshment. Say hello to old friends. And if you find yourself en route to debauchery, have insurance with the Lord, and if you can, Blue Cross, too.

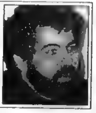
BUDDY, CAN YOU SPARE A DIME?: The "United Buddy Bear" exhibition featuring 133 identical figures of bears, each decorated by a different artist in the style of his or her own country, is a big hit in Jerusalem. To date, nearly $2 million has been raised for children's relief organizations through donations and auctions of mini Buddy Bears. At the end of the exhibit's world tour, the bears will be sold by auction for UNICEF and other organizations that help needy children. [Isranet photo]

The warm and chilly summer

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



This is the most pleasant summer I can remember. Almost every day was sunny and the humidity was low, so even those without air conditioning didn't suffer.

I stepped outside after writing this article and was greeted by a balmy wind that embraced me as an old friend might.

This summer's weather, however, was also metaphorically fraught with some chilly winds – those of war and strife in our consistently shrinking world. I could feel them while I sat on a cottage dock listening closely to the silence. Within the silence, however, I heard the voices of the captive Israeli soldiers and the children of Sderot hiding while rockets rained down on their unhappy city. The stillness was shrill.

Judaism says we must take advantage of the majesty of our world. Enjoy life. When you come upon a merry lake, dive in. Pick the apple about to fall from the tree and taste it with eyes closed, appreciating the sweetness of such a faultless creation.

Judaism also says that while the community is suffering, it is forbidden to go home and feast. One must fight the inequities.

What does one do then? Do we dangle our feet in the soothing waters of Georgian Bay, ignoring the unbearable pain Jews and non-Jews are going through? Do we remain forever aware of the dying, the tortured, the starving, fearful that we are indifferent to the plight of the millions, and to our fellow Jews surrounded by falling rockets, in a war zone?

I am a Jew and therefore frequently canoe with guilt. The sun tans my nose and a novel sits at my fingertips waiting to be read, but my mind flits off to Israel, Sudan, Congo and the homeless. I'll dive into the water, the one we spoke of, and be mesmerized by the underwater world – the schools of fish and the shimmering rocks – and then the realization of the rest of the world will reawaken inside of me. I will then surface.

Sometimes I'm able to forget about the Iraqi children whose limbs have been blown off by wicked bombs and evil men, and then boom! But then the images reappear and once again I remember the world's pitiful predicament.

I don't know. Tell me. Is it okay for us to enjoy and celebrate while the world is in this whirlwind of lunacy? Was it okay for our grandparents to do so in the '40s when lunacy would have been acceptable, when the world was shrouded in insanity?

Some of us look for the balance. We do this through ritual that encourages us to remember the troubles while enjoying and feeling pleasure. For this reason we break the glass under the chupah, symbolizing our recollection of the destruction of the Temples and ensuring that even at our most joyous moment we consider those who suffered and those who are in turmoil now.

Others are consistently aware of the troubles and rarely, if ever, relax. The reality that women are being raped, one per minute in our world; that kidnapped South Koreans are being executed by those mutant Taliban – these things they can never hide from.

These people are blessed. They are the cursed. Blessed because when you are plagued by awareness at that level, you can't help but respond. Cursed, because when you are aware at that level, the lake is never placid and the sky is neither blue nor grey. Its colours are insignificant to them as they seldom look up to the heavens unless questioning or praying to God.

It is the summer of 2007. Do we frolic or do we fight? Did we do both?

We're thinking green…

Editorial

These days, it's hard to avoid thinking green, whether or not we are taking personal steps to reduce our environmental impact.

As in most areas of life, Judaism has something to say about this issue. Rabbi Yossi Sapirman notes in his article on synagogues that "much of what being Jewish is about is being considerate for the environment."

Also, CJN reporter Leila Speisman examines the relationship between Jewish sources and our responsibilities to the environment.

This Community Focus supplement looks at a number of ways that increased environmental awareness is playing out in the Jewish community, from creative ideas for weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs, to a Jewish environmental bike ride and a summer program in Israel for teachers from Jewish schools. We also look at hospitals, cemeteries and commuting, all with an eye to environmental impact.

In Israel, a major concern for environmentalists is the pollution of lakes and rivers. Sheldon Kirshner reports on his recent visit there to learn about the issue.

It may not be easy being green, but the "carrot" – organic, of course – is a healthier planet for us and for future generations, as well as, on a more immediate basis, the possibility of saving money and improving our health by reducing our reliance on expensive sources of energy and our exposure to harmful substances.

–F.K.

Canadians pedal to help the environment

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Canadians Noam Dolgin and Dianne Saxe get on their bikes on Labour Day weekend, they'll have their own private cheering section.

Dolgin, a 31-year-old environmentalist originally from Vancouver, and Saxe, 54, an environmental lawyer based in Toronto, are taking part in the seventh annual New York Jewish Environmental Bike Ride, sponsored by Hazon, an organization that works to create a healthier and more sustainable Jewish community.

Both are bringing along family members who are among the 100 volunteers handing out food and drinks, and encouraging riders along the route that extends 120 miles from Connecticut to New York City.

The four-day event – the bike ride takes two days – includes a Shabbat retreat at the Isabella Freedman Jewish Retreat Centre in Connecticut, where riders and volunteers will take part in panel discussions, cooking demonstrations, yoga, challah baking and a warm-up bike ride.

Dolgin, whose mother Ruth Hess-Dolgin is travelling from Vancouver to take part in the event, has been helping out on the ride since 2002, and is riding for the second year.

A former associate director of Teva, an environmental learning centre in New York City, Dolgin is now executive director of the Green Zionist Alliance – both organizations are among Hazon's grantees – a lobbying group that works to influence the World Jewish Congress to protect Israel's environment.

"My interest in the field runs deep, and I'm excited to teach about it during the Shabbaton."

Bike rider is committed to the environment

The ride is an important networking opportunity, he said, and it's an opportunity to learn, to spread awareness, and to fundraise.

"It's also a great personal challenge for me. Last year, I moved from being part of the crew to actually riding, so I'm excited about that as well."

Hess-Dolgin credits her son with influencing her to be part of the ride. "Our tradition teaches us to take care of the earth, or else future generations will suffer. We cannot ignore that. Jewish environmentalists are trying to teach us what the sages taught a long time ago."

Dianne Saxe is looking forward to having her mother Gloria Shulman, her daughter Rebecca, and her daughter's fiance Allan Adams, cheering her on and telling her jokes during the ride.

"There is a part of the route that goes uphill for a number of hours, and I'll certainly need encouragement then. Last year, I went alone, so I'm happy to make this a family affair."

She's taking part, she said, because of her lifelong commitment to the environment, and because of her passion for building environmental bridges in Israel between Jews and Arabs.

Funds raised from her ride are going to the Arava Institute for environmental studies in Israel, a centre situated on Kibbutz Ketura in Israel's Southern Arava Valley near the Jordanian and Egyptian borders and the Gulf of Aqaba/Eilat that prepares future Arab and Jewish leaders to co-operatively solve the region's environmental challenges.

In preparation for her ride, she said, she's done "lots of cycling, weights and swimming, and I walk up the 15 flights of stairs to my office while carrying my dog."

Synagogues should 'model a community that is sustainable'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Based on Jewish principles, being environmentally friendly and environmentally sensitive is "the only right way to consider building a synagogue," says Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, a nature photographer as well as a pulpit rabbi.

"So much of what being Jewish is about is being considerate for the environment. Our calendar is based on the seasons. Our celebrations are seasonal. Everything is tied to the agricultural cycle. There are more blessings for natural events than anything else in Judaism."

Rabbi Yossi Sapirman

Beth Torah Congregation, which Rabbi Sapirman leads, is still in the planning stages of expanding and renovating its 42-year-old building. "Synagogues, as models of community, should model a community that is sustainable and considerate," he said.

The $4-million Beth Torah project – which will include a new, 350-seat sanctuary and a new chapel, foyer and reception area – is mandated "to go green where possible, where it's not going to cost us more but less, and where we can make a difference," said Harold Wolkin, the building project's co-chair.

Certain items, such as solar panels, are still not cost-effective for smaller buildings, said Wolkin, who is in the solar energy business. "They fit beautifully on large commercial properties like seniors' residences," he said.

Solar energy, he noted, has been a "slow mover" in Canada, although even in winter months in Toronto there is enough sun to make it viable.

Other ways to make the building more efficient range from the type of glass used in the windows to low-energy light fixtures and low-emission finishes, he added.

Rabbi Sapirman agrees with Wolkin that it's important to be practical. "[A synagogue] doesn't have to be the ultimate model, but it has to be visibly aware and considerate," the rabbi said.

Environmental activities at Beth Torah in the past include planting plants and trees for Tu b'Shvat, hosting Environment Day for the city of Toronto and running clothing drives for Jewish Family and Child's Just a Second shop.

Beth Torah's architect, Cindy Rendely, said that often "green" building involves a larger initial cost and is the first thing to go once a budget is put together. However, she noted, there is also a long-term gain in terms of cost savings and "a better green world."

One of the options being discussed at Beth Torah is a "green roof," occupiable space on top of the building that would be able to support earth and plantings. Another is a "green living wall" – a structure built and layered up in a way that supports live green plantings growing vertically on its face.

The latter option, which often features a water element, is not only attractive from an esthetic standpoint but also triggers a cycle of cleaning the air, she said.

"I would say there's a trend in general, first of all in the entire world, and in architecture particularly [to be environmentally sensitive,]" said Rendely. She has noticed a stepped-up interest in the last six months to a year.

Other synagogues that are thinking green – or moving in that direction – include Beth Tzedec Congregation, Holy Blossom Temple, Congregation Darchei Noam and the First Narayever Congregation. The latter two shuls are working with Faith & the Common Good, a national organization that facilitates interfaith action on matters of social and environmental concern.

- Darchei Noam, Toronto's only Reconstructionist congregation, is renovating and expanding the 1970s-era building that used to belong to Adath Sholom Synagogue. Environmentally sensitive changes, according to the congregation's website, include a high degree of insulation, energy efficient windows, new plumbing systems and motion detection fixtures that minimize water use. Also, there will be a maximally efficient nine-zone heating and cooling system with separate controls for different parts of the building, including heat recovery and carbon dioxide sensors to minimize energy use.
- Holy Blossom, the largest Reform congregation in Canada, is housed in a 1938 building with "virtually no insulation," said Benjamin Applebaum, the synagogue's executive director. An extensive renovation project is planned and the intention is that the building will be a LEED building," referring to the internationally recognized Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design standards. "We just haven't worked through the details to know at what level of LEED we will comply… It will be a more efficient building," he said.

Equipment today is 'so much more advanced'

• Beth Tzedec started looking into renovating its mid-1950s building in 1999, along with United Synagogue Day School, whose southern campus is housed in the building. However, because of rising prices for renovation and a demographic shift resulting in fewer students at the school, the synagogue has been re-evaluating its original plans and deciding which aspects to go ahead with, according to Lawrie Lubin, co-chair of the construction subcommittee of the building expansion and renovation committee.

Seen is a rendering of Beth Torah Congregation's proposed exterior.

One change that has been implemented, he said, is a switch from electricity to gas for the ovens in the main kitchen, which was rebuilt about a year ago. "It's something very simple," he said, noting that the electric ovens "just sucked power."

Other planned changes include improving indoor air quality, and finding ways to air-condition only areas of the synagogue that are in use, to reduce energy consumption. "Equipment today is so much more advanced" than when the synagogue was built, he added. "We have good consultants who will help us achieve a much better cost benefit and at the same time will be much more environmentally friendly."

Also, said Lubin, Beth Tzedec has an ongoing program of replacing existing lights with more energy-efficient bulbs and "trying to have lighting that is task-oriented" to reduce the amount of overall lighting that is needed to illuminate larger areas.

Although it is too early to know the exact materials that will be used, "it's clearly on the radar that you look for paints that do not give off gases and carpets that are not made of certain synthetic components that give off fumes," Lubin said. "There are all kinds of environmental materials that are beneficial, or at least not detrimental, that have only recently been identified."

Although price is "always an issue," increasing demand has made environmentally friendly products much more affordable than they used to be, said Lubin, who is in the real estate development business. "It's becoming far more the norm."

Teachers learn environmental lessons in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The day after Esther Etigson returned home from a summer environmental program for teachers in Israel, she went shopping for environmentally friendly light bulbs.

A junior high Judaic studies teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools, Etigson was one of two dozen participants who represented four Jewish day schools and nine supplementary programs.

The 10-day environmental program, From Here Everything Grows, now in its second year, is run by Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz), formerly UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education. The environmental program includes pre- and post-trip components in Toronto – even a field trip to the ravine behind the Lipa Green Building.

The followup component this month focuses on how to implement what participants learned and how schools can work together, as well as how participants can become "ambassadors" on the subject of environmentalism within the community, said the Mercaz's Silvia Eilath, a program co-ordinator.

The itinerary included visits to a bird sanctuary in Eilat, two nature reserves and a stay at Kibbutz Ketura, home to the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies and Keren Kolot, an educational institution that combines text study with hiking and learning about the desert. The participants also went on mountain hikes and met with environmental educators and activists.

"Through Torah you learn how to preserve the earth that God has given," said Etigson, who loves nature and is vigilant about recycling at home. "Kids know when you believe in something, because you're consistent about it. One of my top things in the school is being consistent."

"A trip like that… makes it even more a part of you," she said, adding that she would like to step up recycling efforts at her school, which has blue boxes in the classroom but little in the way of a formalized recycling program.

Etigson said it was valuable to bring together educators from different schools who could learn from each other. She noted that there were three teachers from the Toronto Heschel School, which is particularly advanced in its environmental practices. She also said that, because there were five teachers from Associated, the school now has a strong team of environmentally aware educators.

Jewish values offer basis for green classes

While she would love to see Associated have its own hothouse – similar to one she saw at a school in Israel – a more immediate goal for Etigson is to bring plants into her classroom and have her students participate in taking care of them.

In addition to raising educators' environmental consciousness, the program aims to convey a love of Israel through the environment, said Eilath. The participants got "to know the environment and appreciate it," she added.

"One more focus for us was to integrate concern for the environment based on Jewish values," said Ruth Rohn, the Mercaz's other co-ordinator of the program.

A session with author Jeremy Benstein during the trip addressed the subject of consumerism, said Rohn. "The environmental crisis is a crisis of human attitudes and behaviour… We have to look at ourselves. Of course, the Torah is a wonderful guide for that. The 10th commandment says we're not supposed to covet. Our society has created a culture of covetousness. This is something we have to be aware of and work against."

Concern for the environment is "a human issue that knows no boundaries" and brings people together, she said, citing co-operative Jewish-Arab ventures she learned about in Israel. "This to me was extremely inspiring."

Karen Goodis, principal of the Beth Sholom Hebrew School said, "Personally, the trip made me far more environmentally aware."

Concern for the environment is 'a human issue that knows no boundaries'

She plans to ask her students to bring their snacks in reusable containers and to look for recyclable packaging when buying items for the school, she said. If necessary, she will bring the packaging home to recycle.

Goodis also noted that anything printed for students is printed on both sides of the paper, but that the bulk of school communication is done by e-mail instead of using paper.

The message she has for students now is that they are caretakers for the environment [the Jewish concept of ba'al tashchit], she said. "We have a responsibility. If each individual does one less energy inefficient act, it will make a difference."

Israel's water resources are being sullied

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A sombre anniversary was marked recently. Ten years ago last month, four Australian athletes taking part in the Maccabiah Games in Tel Aviv were crossing a footbridge across the Yarkon River when it buckled and collapsed. Two athletes drowned and two more later died from infections caused by toxins in the murky waters.

Apart from exposing appallingly shoddy workmanship, for which the engineer and contractors were subsequently convicted and sentenced to relatively short prison terms, the incident underscored the fact that many of Israel's precious water resources are heavily polluted.

In a generally arid land where every drop of water should count, the Maccabiah disaster was an indictment of short-sightedness on the part of the government and a commentary on its priorities.

To find out more about this patently unacceptable situation, I spent several days touring the country to better understand what ails Israel's environment.

My hosts were Zalul, the Association for Environmental Protection, an eight-year-old non-governmental organization that is dedicated to protecting the rivers and seas of Israel, and the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI), which has been around for decades and accomplished much in educating Israelis about their natural patrimony.

Moshe Shemma – a senior SPNI official who took me to an improbable bird sanctuary on the grounds of a salt factory in Atlit and to a SPNI field school facing the Mediterranean Sea near Nahariya – said Israelis are conscious of the damage they have steadily inflicted on the environment, and that further delays in fixing it will not be tolerated. "We realize we can't wait until our problems with the Arabs are resolved. We just can't wait any more."

Swimmers enjoy a dip in the northern part of the Jordan River.

Matan Konwitz, the director of SPNI's field school in Gesher Haziv, which resembles a kibbutz and faces a lagoon, was blunter. "The government, given our scarce resources, has to be much tougher in enacting laws to combat water and air pollution."

I basically heard the same complaint from Ezer Fischler, Zalul's representative in the north. To accentuate this point, he drove me to the sweeping beach at Acre Bay, one of Israel's beauty spots.

Once a promising tourist mecca, ideal for bathers and surfers, Acre Bay is forlorn and neglected today, its sandy beach littered with debris carried by tides from Lebanon and its waters sullied by the discharge of heavy-metal industrial wastewater from nearby factories.

Fischler, a trained environmentalist who takes his job seriously, lamented that a pipeline from factories in the Galilee dumps 5,000 cubic metres of sewage into the bay on a daily basis.

"This is one of the most polluted areas in the Mediterranean Sea," he observed. "It was once a rich fishing ground, but no more."

He turned toward the concrete shell of a half-built hotel some 50 metres from the beach. "They stopped construction when they realized that tourists wern't coming here anymore," he said.

'A lot of work' remains to be done

He does not merely wring his hands in despair. Zalul will sue the ministry of the environment if the status quo is maintained.

A few days later, I spoke to Zalul's managing director, a lawyer named Yariv Abramovich.

"Acre Bay can be restored as a tourist destination if the government acts," he declared. Abramovich is hardly a fanatic. All he asks is that potential polluters be moved at least 10 kilometres away from the bay.

Fischler next took me to Haifa's Kishon River, one of the most despoiled rivers in Israel.

Chemical plants in the vicinity have dumped tons of sludge, two metres thick, into the river. It is so dirty that Israeli frogmen who trained in its waters years ago have contracted cancer.

> Jordan River is badly contaminated

When Fischler was a navy diver, he would have to continually scrub the oily residue of the sludge off his body.

The Kishon is currently being cleaned up by dredgers, but the sludge is being disposed of in a site in the Mediterranean Sea.

Not surprisingly, Abramovich is outraged. "We want the sludge to be properly treated before it is dumped," he said. "We're trying to convince the government to do this. Right now, the problem is being transferred from one place to another."

Several years ago, the city of Haifa built a recreational area, with picnic benches, along the banks of the Kishon. But the park remains empty, foul odours having discouraged people from using it. "There is a lot of work to be done here," said Fischler.

We then drove northward toward the storied Jordan River, Israel's longest river and its only one with a permanent year-round flow.

Supplying Israel with approximately 50 per cent of its potable water, it is formed in the mountains of eastern Lebanon. Its four tributaries – the Hasbani, the Banias, the Dan and the Ayoun – merge near Kibbutz Sde Nehemya, in the Huleh Valley.

Demarcating Israel's border with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, its longest with any of its Arab neighbours, the Jordan River is relatively clean in its upper northern reaches. Indeed, the National Water Carrier, which was built in the early 1950s to develop the country, transports water from the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee to the Negev.

But in its downstream stretch, from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, the Jordan River is badly contaminated, its ecosystem having been virtually destroyed, and looks remarkably like a drainage ditch.

Pollution levels growing worse

To Fischler, the southern portion is nothing less than a mess.

"It's really a sewage canal," he said indignantly. "Since this part of the river is not regarded or utilized as a source for drinking water, it is not seen as important."

As a result, pollution levels grow worse by the day, and the wastewater carried by the Jordan River ends up in the Dead Sea, which is shrinking.

According to a report issued by the Friends of Earth-Middle East this past June, the lower section of the Jordan River, having been diverted by Israel, Jordan and Syria for domestic and agricultural use, is a study in ecological devastation.

The World Monuments Fund, which draws attention to threatened cultural sites around the globe, has also described the southern route as endangered.

The problem came into clearer focus as we left Tiberias and headed into the sultry Jordan Valley. Fischler stopped at the Hazor, a muddy, meandering stream cutting through a deep gorge bristling with vegetation and dribbling into the Jordan River.

Walking across a bridge under a blazing sun, I looked down at the placid water, catching the sight of a glinting mini-waterfall cascading down rocks and of fat turtles swimming in the shallows.

To my untrained eye, everything seemed quite normal. But to Fischler, the Hazor is symptomatic of the depths to which the lower Jordan River has sunk.

Ezer Fischler

"The waterfall you see," he said, "is made up of wastewater. It is totally polluted. We have laws against pollution, but they're not being enforced. It seems as if our water inspectors are not dealing with this issue."

Abramovich suggested that the Jordan River can be rehabilitated, but only if Israel and Jordan co-operate.

Under the 1994 peace treaty, the two countries are required to protect the river against "any pollution, contamination [and] harm."

In practice, Israel and Jordan are not living up to the ideals of the treaty, thereby dooming a river sacred to both Jews and Christians.

It's easy to plan an environmentally friendly wedding

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When most girls envision their wedding day, they picture their princess-like wedding dress, beautiful flowers and memories that last a lifetime. But when Aviva Allen began planning her October wedding, having an environmentally friendly event was at the top of her priority list.

Although environmental issues such as climate change and conservation have been hot topics for years, taking the steps to minimize waste and make eco-friendly choices for her Toronto wedding was a challenge, said Allen, a nutritionist, environmentalist and author of The Organic Kosher Cookbook.

"There were a number of things that I had in mind when I first started planning, and I guess a lot of them aren't going to be able to happen, unfortunately, because there is not a lot of availability for these things in Toronto. You look online and you see all these articles about green weddings and all of that, and there are a lot more resources in the States," she said.

"Even looking for a ketubah and asking for one on recycled paper – they look at me like I'm crazy… No one has ever asked them before. And the same for invitations and for benchers. That's definitely been a struggle."

Aviva Allen

Despite the challenges, however, Allen was able to make decisions for her wedding that will minimize the impact it will have on the environment.

"I was able to do a lot for the engagement party because it was smaller and at our house. We printed the invitations ourselves and I bought paper… from Grassroots [a Toronto-based environmental products store]. Some was made of hemp and some was made of coffee beans. It's expensive paper, but because it was a smaller [event], it was OK. We also got these compostable plates – they're like paper plates, but they're not even made from paper and you can put them in the compost," she said.

"For the wedding invitations, it wasn't going to work… [But] I was finally able to get sort of a compromise. The part that the actual writing is printed on is semi-recycled paper and the outside is natural paper."

As for the ketubah, Allen said she would print it herself on recycled paper.

Perhaps the most important aspect of planning a wedding is the menu, and as a nutritionist, Allen wanted to make sure that she would provide her guests with quality food.

She chose GMB, a catering company that provides gourmet kosher cuisine, and she made special requests about what would be served.

"I wanted it to be vegetarian actually, but not everyone was on board with that," she said with a laugh.

Bride requests organic, seasonal and local food

"The compromise is going to be that there will be a vegetarian buffet, but we'll have a fish dish. I don't think that is going to make the people happy who are expecting [meat], but it's something. I couldn't justify having all those chickens die just for my wedding," Allen said, adding that she is not a vegetarian – she does eat organic chicken – but decided that it would be too expensive to order enough organic chicken for 250 people.

Allen said it was a challenge for her to find caterers who specialize in organic food.

"I requested from the caterer to do as much organic and seasonal and local as they can. In terms of choosing the menu, I played a large role in making sure that there were a lot of seasonal foods involved."

Allen said ordering the wine she wanted was also an issue.

"There is some organic wine that is kosher … We tried getting some in, but because there are only certain brands available with certain distributors in the city, some of them were not very co-operative with our special request. It was difficult. There aren't really any kosher organic wines that are mevushal, so it wouldn't be allowed in the synagogue anyway," said Allen, the daughter of Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto, where she's getting married.

"What we may end up doing is, I found out that Baron Herzog makes their wine with grapes that are grown sustainably, like with sustainable growing processes, and they're certified, so it's not as good as being organic, but it's better than other options."

She said when it comes to the shul, as the rabbi's daughter, she is always making suggestions about how to make the building more sustainable, but her ideas aren't always received with enthusiasm.

"We don't really have a lot of control over the facility, but believe me, I've tried to make our shul a bit greener in the past. But there is resistance. It's not easy. There are a lot of synagogues in the States now that are going green and are looking into better energy saving methods," she said.

Her options also seemed limited when it came to ordering organic flowers, and she said the company they chose wasn't able to get her order together in time.

"They weren't really on the ball and we weren't able to go with them because we had to book it and they couldn't get us the information in time. I really did want to use them. We're using minimal flowers. We're not having large arrangements near the chupah and that sort of thing. I wanted to use a lot of other things to decorate. It's going to be a fall wedding, so I'm going to use leaves and squashes and things to decorate it, and candles and stuff."

Above are samples of invitations printed on recycled paper.

Local designer means dress won't be shipped

As for her dress, Allen considered buying off-white hemp and silk blend fabric, at about $20 a metre from the Toronto Hemp Company, and having the dress custom made.

"I was going to do that, but then I started trying on dresses and saw how difficult it was to find one that fits so well, and I thought that if I tried to have one made from scratch, it might not come out right, so I was too nervous about that. I ended up finding one in a store, and the designer is local, from Toronto, so it didn't need to be shipped from somewhere far away, and the material is raw silk, so it's a natural fibre. So that was my compromise there."

For those who are interested in making eco-friendly choices but want to ease into it, Allen suggested asking that recycled paper be used for anything that needs to be printed.

"That's something that anyone could do. It might mean that you're more limited in terms of where you can go to get it, but more printers can print on recycled paper now and the invitation person that I went to, she had never done it before, but when I asked for it, she looked into it and she was able to get it," Allen said.

"If I had my way, I would have done an e-vite, not a formal invitation. I think that when I have kids, the first simchah I do, the bar or bat mitzvah, I would do an e-vite, but the older generation wants to have that formal printed invitation. You can have no paper at all or you can have a phone RSVP instead of a printed response card."

An armful of organic roses make a beautiful bridal bouquet.

She said another energy saving method is to have the reception in the same place as the ceremony so that people don't have to travel.

While Allen has made many eco-friendly choices for her wedding, she said she was not getting exactly what I wanted.

"It's not my ideal, but I'm trying to do the best that I can with what I have to work with in the city… I think we're just behind."

On the other hand, Allen is confident that Torontonians will catch on to these trends.

"Now, Jewish environmental organizations are popping up here in Toronto that are doing some great things."

But the key to making sure that Torontonians have just as many environmentally friendly options as their American counterparts is to demand it from those who are in the wedding business.

"When I ask for something on recycled paper, they look at me like I'm the first person who has ever asked for it, but the more people who ask for it, the more people will want to accommodate that... If people are asking for it, the companies will supply it."

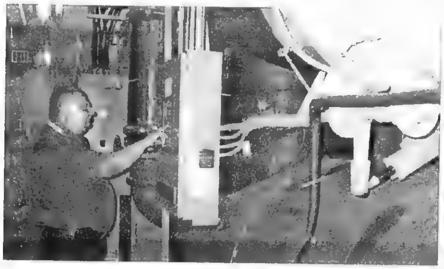
Jewish hospitals go green

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

These days, hospitals aren't just concerned with the people inside their walls, they're also trying to help those on the outside.

The environment is on everybody's mind, and Toronto institutions such as Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest have taken steps to reduce their carbon footprints for the good of the community and their bottom lines.

At Mount Sinai, a forward-thinking vision of cost efficiency and environmental friendliness has led the hospital to begin the shift toward new, "greener" technology.



Robert Marcinkiewicz, Baycrest's manager of plant operations, checks the 770-tonne chiller that cools the main building, including the nursing home and hospital. The high-efficiency chiller was installed in 1999 during construction of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged.

Altaf Stationwala, Mount Sinai's senior vice-president of operations and development, explained to The CJN how, within two years, his hospital will be saving close to 90 per cent on its air conditioning bills and reducing its drain on the city's power grid.

Rather than continue to rely on traditional air conditioning technology, which sucks up many kilowatts to keep its building cool, the hospital will soon be connected to a "cooling loop" that has been set up in the downtown core by Enwave Energy Corporation, a Toronto company that siphons off frigid water from the depths of Lake Ontario and uses the water's ambient 4 C temperature to help chill buildings in the city.

"We [currently] have a cooling tower on the roof. It's fed by compressors that consume electricity that cool the water which goes into our heat exchanger for the air-handling units," Stationwala said. "[With Enwave], instead of requiring electricity to get cold water from the coils, we take the cold water from the lake and it consumes no electricity."

Enwave will connect Mount Sinai to its system over the next two years.

"The [Mount Sinai] connection is a further connection to a system that's already in place all the way up to Queen's Park. We have water supply and return lines that go up Bay Street," said Kevin Loughborough, vice-president of major projects for Enwave.

Stationwala didn't say how much the project would cost Mount Sinai, but based on cost estimates, he predicted that "in about seven or eight years, the [investment] capital will be paid for and it will be ongoing savings on utility costs to the hospital."

Over at Baycrest, hospital management has instituted a formal "green plan" that follows strict guidelines of energy conservation.

According to spokesperson Kelly Connelly, Baycrest has reduced its electrical needs by working closely with Toronto Hydro and by implementing many cost-saving and environmental initiatives such as retrofitting lights, upgrading boilers, replacing old thermostats, re-caulking the hospital's infrastructure and replacing old computer screens with new, energy-efficient flat screens.

And Baycrest has also paid attention to the little things that help the environment.

For instance, Baycrest's housekeeping department has switched to environmentally friendly cleaning products and will only change garbage bin liners when they's soiled.

Its efforts have been successful. The hospital has seen its energy usage drop over the last decade, reducing its energy consumption by 10 million kilowatt hours for what it estimates to be $900,000 in energy savings overall.

But Baycrest is not content to rest on its laurels.

"Can Baycrest improve its [environmental] efforts?… Absolutely," Connelly said. "We know we can do a better job."

To address this, in the fall, Baycrest will introduce a revised green plan to help the hospital continue perfecting its "three Rs" philosophy: reduce, re-use and recycle.

Baycrest's Green Living Roof is part of the newly installed Spiro Family Garden, adjacent to Baycrest Hospital and accessible from the second floor. The roof, with low-maintenance plants and a specialized drainage system, acts as an insulator that helps reduce energy costs in both winter and summer.

Agency conjures greener pastures from gridlock

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Harry Potter and climate change are two of today's hottest topics, says transit advocate Brian Shifman. I rode the rocket to visit the executive director of Smart Commute North Toronto, Vaughan (a.k.a. Smart Commute NTV) at his office on York University's Keele Street campus.

There were no wizards in sight, however.

He used the Potter-climate parallel in jest – referring to a Time magazine spread that parodied the famous book series with the possible sequel idea, "Harry Potter and the Specter of Global Warming: Something is afoul at Hogwarts when the Ministry of Magic fines the school for excessive owl emissions" – but Shifman is serious about stopping climate change by taking cars off the road.

"We're trying to help employees get to and from work more easily," he explained.

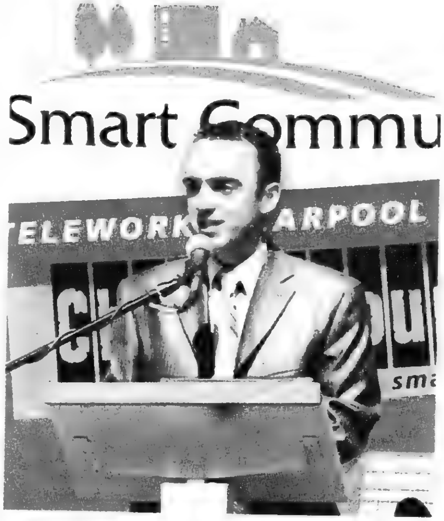
Smart Commute is a non-profit group that aims to reduce traffic congestion and improve air quality by working with business and government to reduce the use of single occupancy vehicles.

And with an estimated 85 per cent of commuters in the Greater Toronto Area driving to work alone, the need for smarter commuting choices is a no-brainer.

85 per cent of commuters in the GTA drive to work alone

Appropriate to the subject matter, our interview took place outside in a grassy area ringed by a roadway that's used by hundreds of TTC, GO and York Region Transit buses each day.

Like public transit, some commuting alternatives are obvious, including cycling, walking or carpooling, the latter of which, in addition to saving gas, allows cars to take advantage of high occupancy vehicle lanes on highways.



Brian Shifman, executive director of Smart Commute NTV, addresses a crowd of 200 business people, political representatives and area employees at Unlock Gridlock, an event organized by the agency last September, held at Enbridge Gas Distribution in North York.

Less obvious possibilities include teleworking – working from home or a virtual office close by – and van-pooling, where up to eight people plus a driver commute together in a larger vehicle.

Smart Commute NTV handles two of seven Smart Commute regions in the Greater Toronto Area and Hamilton. Its north Toronto section is responsible for the northeastern part of the city, while its Vaughan division oversees the northwestern and York University areas.

The agency's programs raise awareness about alternative transportation options, Shifman said.

The choices are more mundane than, say, Harry, Ron and Hermione's commute to Hogwarts by train from Platform 9¾, or "disapparating" – magically disappearing from one location only to reappear in another.

But they can make a difference here in our warming muggle world.

One transit idea is the carpool zone (www.carpoolzone.ca), which allows users to find carpool buddies in their geographic region or place of employment. Other programs include the Clean Air Commute and Commuter Challenge, short-terms projects that encourage commuters to break out of their daily routines.

"It could be something as simple as inflating your tires to create less carbon dioxide emissions, or, more likely, taking transit or carpooling or van-pooling for a week," Shifman said.

Last year, through its various programs, Smart Commute NTV helped to eliminate 5,000 daily vehicle trips, which equalled about 1.2 million trips in 2006.

Shifman added that the non-profit was responsible for 61 million fewer vehicle kilometres travelled last year and 14,000 fewer tonnes of carbon dioxide emissions.

These numbers boil down to fewer cars on the road, and, eventually, cleaner air, he said.

Last year,… Smart Commute NTV helped to eliminate 5,000 daily vehicle trips

"I think often changes like that take a few years," he said.

"That's something Smart Commute is particularly good at – showing people what their options are, encouraging government to match people's needs for transportation to what actually exists, and enabling people to actually make that change," he added.

But the advantages are more than just environmental.

"There's a real lifestyle benefit to being on transit and being able to read a book or do your work instead of sitting in traffic all stressed out," Shifman said.

"You will arrive to work and be more productive if you haven't been stuck in traffic."

Smart Commute NTV started in 2001 as the GTA's first Smart Commute branch.

Shifman came on board in 2005. While he originally drove alone to work from the Lawrence and Bayview area, he recently moved downtown and now takes a combination of subway and bus to get to work.

Eventually, with the planned extension of the Spadina subway line to York – Shifman is also a member of the Spadina-York Subway Extension Committee – he'll just take the subway.

"It isn't because I'm executive director of Smart Commute that I moved. It's because I wanted a lifestyle change that enables me to take transit and to be near an urbanized community. I enjoy urbanized life. But I think it also sends the right message."

The interview ended, and Shifman walked me from the grass to a waiting TTC bus, which he noted was one of about 1,600 public transit vehicles that come to York every day.

As I sat down to start my journey back to The CJN's office across town, I cracked open my hot-off-the-press edition of Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows, hoping to enjoy the last adventures of the boy wizard on my stress-free and environmentally smart commute.

Outdoors club celebrates 10th anniversary

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The Mosaic Outdoors Club of Ontario (MOCO) has been canoeing, hiking and schmoozing for 10 years.

"This is our most amazing year ever," said club president Norm Abrams. "We're all about the outdoors. We enjoy the outdoors. We do it better than anybody."

MOCO offers a different event almost every Sunday, as well as the occasional weekend getaway. Events run the gamut from hiking to bowling to kayaking to dancing.

The club currently has 153 members, its largest number yet, up from 120 last year. It is affiliated with the Mosaic Outdoors Clubs of America, founded in 1988 and named after Moses, the first outdoor Jew. Toronto-based MOCO is the only Canadian club of about 20 across North America, and one of the five largest.

Abrams is in the middle of his third and last term as president. On a sunny summer day, seated at a picnic table in the spacious area behind his office at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, the architect discussed the club and his love of the outdoors.

"I absolutely adore this," he said, gesturing to the foliage around him. "Being at one with nature, for me, is amazing.

"I think the people who love the club most are the people who share these four things – Judaism, nature, the outdoors and being active."

Annual membership in the not-for-profit MOCO is $30, plus admission cost for events that require fees. Non-members pay $6 per outing. Events are led by members, aided by how-to-lead templates available on the club's website, www.mosaictoronto.org.

The club is always looking for new members and volunteers to help with events and lead the organization.

Abrams said it is difficult to recruit more members because of challenges in getting the word out, and because there are misconceptions about the club.

"There is a perception that a Jewish outdoors club is a bit of an oxymoron, but I don't believe that," Abrams said, referring to the stereotype that Jewish people are not athletic.

"I actually think that there's a perception in the Jewish community that we're too rugged. And the fact of the matter is, in our club, we have about 20 to 30 hard-core folks who like the canoe trips [and] don't mind tenting it for a three-day weekend… but we have 153 members.

"We have a huge array of people, from those that are really experienced and rugged to those that will only go on a city walk, and everything in between," he added.

He would like to see membership grow substantially, ideally by adding a zero to the 153 people he referred to.

In addition to exercise, adventure and the outdoors, MOCO members also enjoy the many opportunities that the club offers for socialization.

"It's so non-threatening; it's an amazing way to meet people," Abrams said.

He recalled his first hike with the club. Sixty people came out, and it was an easy way to chat with many people in a short amount of time and a great environment.

"It sure beats J-Date," he joked.

MOCO would also like to see more young people join. While there are a few younger members, the majority are in their 40s and 50s, and he feels this may be something of a deterrent for younger newbies checking out the club. The group is looking into hosting a youth-only event.

.Also on the agenda for the club's future is emphasizing environmental activism more "rigorously and vigorously," Abrams said.

The club already takes part in annual tree planting activities with the Evergreen charity and garbage pick-ups around the city.

"We wear our environmentally consciousness hat reasonably well, but we could do better," he said. The board plans to discuss this issue at a fall retreat.

Involvement with MOCO is very rewarding, Abrams said. At a recent board meeting, one of his colleagues stood up unprompted and thanked him for his hard work as both president and event leader.

"I had tears in my eyes. You know the expression that something is worth a million bucks? That is worth a million dollars. I would rather have that than a million dollars."

Hillel rabbi raises awareness of Jewish environmentalism

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Environmentalism on campus may not be a new phenomenon, but Aaron Levy, Hillel of Greater Toronto's campus rabbi, has been trying to bring more of a Jewish flavour to the issue.

Just last spring, Rabbi Levy and Hillel joined forces with Torat Hatevah, the Jewish Nature Centre of Canada – an organization that promotes ecological awareness and provides models for spiritually and ecologically sustainable Jewish living – to organize the Jewish Environmental Conference and Eco-Shabbaton, which was the first of its kind in Canada.

The conference, which was held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, included lectures, workshops and panels that were meant to give participants a platform to discuss important Jewish environmental issues.

"The conference was about the intersection of Judaism and the environment," said Rabbi Levy, who has been working at Hillel at U of T for a year.

"Within Jewish text and tradition, there is a long-standing concern for the environment, not usually expressed in the same language that modern environmentalism is expressed, but it is certainly there in a different idiom," said Rabbi Levy, who added that he had been interested in environmentalism since he was in grade school and first learned about recycling.

"There is a biblical prohibition on unnecessary waste of any material, concern for the well-being of people's health and animals as well, to diminish pain and suffering for them."

"There is an overarching ethos in Judaism that the earth is the Lord's and the humans live temporarily on the earth and we do not own it and therefore it is not ours to do with it what we please. We have to have concern for keeping the earth sustainable for future generations," he said.

The conference, which was attended by about 200 students, gave them the opportunity to address issues such as local Jewish activism versus Israel environmental activism, the Jewish response to the current environmental crisis, and how to create a community network that will facilitate grassroots activism in the Jewish community.

The second part of the program, the Eco-Shabbaton, offered students the opportunity to explore the benefits of eating organically grown food, and it also featured discussions, workshops and panel discussions on topics including vegetarianism and Judaism, Kabbalah and ecology, and halachic perspectives on environmental and ecological issues.

Many students are involved on a secular level

Nora Saks, 21, a fourth-year U of T environment and society student who is originally from Maryland and is spending her summer there working on a family-owned organic fruit and vegetable farm, attended the conference last spring.

She said she has been interested in environmental issues since she was a young girl, but became active in high school.

"I always liked being outside, and animals and plants. In high school, I got involved in a small, local, student-run environmental group, which is where I learned about environmentalism with a capital E," Saks said.

She said she wanted to participate in the conference because, coming from an affiliated Jewish family, she is interested in what the religious position is on environmental issues.

"I've been wondering more in the past few years about what the religion has to say about it, or what the evolving message is… I want to know what Judaism has to say, but it's not like I'm waiting for a verse in the Bible to tell me what to do," she said.

"[It's interesting to see] how you can make long-lived Jewish traditions still meaningful by looking at the world around you."

About three months before the conference, in January 2007, Saks was first introduced to Jewish environmentalism when she was accepted to go on a green-themed Hillel Israel trip.

"It was the first of its kind run [by] Hillel, and essentially the idea was to bring back people who had already seen Israel on one level and look at resource and environmental issues within the Israeli context. That involved us trekking around for 10 days.

"We talked to people in the government about plans they had, policies they were working on, we talked to people bringing Palestinian and Israeli kids together through recycling campaigns, we visited the forest that had been bombed out during the [Second] Lebanon War… it was just looking at problems and looking at solutions and seeing how Israel was dealing with it," Saks said.

Nora Saks, far right, poses with two other participants on the green-themed Hillel trip to Israel last January.

Although Saks was open to learning about the environment from a Jewish perspective, Rabbi Levy realizes that many Jewish students are involved on a secular level.

"Aside from Jewish students who express their interest in environmental issues, through a Jewish angle, there are plenty of Jewish students who are involved in environmental groups on and off campus and who are working on projects," Rabbi Levy said, "but not necessarily looking at it from a Jewish angle."

'No shortage' of environmental campus groups

Saks said, "I'm a classic example. I never had a lot of friends at Hillel, and it never really struck a chord with me, but in my classes and other groups I come in contact with, there are always a ton of Jews, and pretty involved ones, who don't prefer to make [Judaism] their number 1 identity, but are Jewish and active nonetheless," said Saks, who is also the volunteer co-ordinator for a campus group that raises funds for environmental projects.

She also helped organize a campus cooking group called the Hot Yam after the campus vegetarian café closed down.

"We were all confused and hungry for non-crappy food on campus… We started cooking vegan, mostly organic meals for about 100 people a week. It was really fun. We even had a Passover-friendly Hot Yam lunch one day."

On most other university campuses, there is no shortage of environmental groups. In fact, at U of T alone, there are at least 10 eco-groups that a student can choose from.

But Rabbi Levy is interested in moving forward with the concepts brought forth at the Jewish Environmental Conference and is in the process of organizing a grassroots Jewish-student-led group called Eco-Jews.

"It is basically at the level of having a general interest meeting to see who is interested… This year, we'll be going ahead in earnest and trying to attract attention to it and really get it started."

Rabbi Levy said that when they came together for the initial general meeting, the students were interested in three basic themes: outings, education and action.

Students were interested in three basic themes: outings, education and action

"The outings are basically doing programs to get Jewish students outdoors more, going camping or hiking, canoeing, walking around the city, exploring different parks… and looking at problems and seeing what needs to be done.

"In terms of education, the goal is to create a variety of programs to educate Jewish students and the broader Jewish community about environmental issues from a Jewish perspective," he said, adding that he hopes to initiate projects such as greening the Wolfond Centre, to try to improve the building's sustainability.

He said he hopes that Jewish students will also join forces with non-Jewish students throughout the university who are engaged in environmental advocacy so that there is a Jewish voice included in those projects as well.

Saks, who hopes to be involved with Eco-Jews next school year despite her many other commitments, said that even though there are many secular environmental groups on campus that many Jewish students are involved with, it can't hurt to create a Jewish group to reach out to students on another level.

"It would be good to have a presence at Hillel for Jewish people who wouldn't make the connection [to environmentalism] otherwise."

A section of Pardes Shalom cemetery

Most people don't think about cemeteries when they think of environmental conservation. Yet the desire for calm, esthetically pleasing surroundings to help ease family and friends of the dearly departed remains.

While Halachah remains rather silent on "green" preservation of the environment at Jewish burial grounds, most people agree that visitors prefer a serene experience at a cemetery.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, president of the Toronto Vaad Harabonim, suggests that while no halachic imperative exists in this regard, there is a baseline that should be upheld.

"Cemeteries, being holy ground, should be kept in a respectful looking manner," he said. "The grass should be maintained… clean and shouldn't be used for things other than for the honour of the deceased."

Stephen Speisman, executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park cemetery (Pardes Shalom), knows visitors prefer greenery, and he ensures that when they come to the community cemetery, it's a green experience.

"Pesticides are generally banned from lawns [in Toronto]. But cemeteries, in general, are excluded from these restrictions," he said. "Because there would be a tremendous public outcry… if the grass was allowed to go to seed."

But Speisman notes that Jewish burial rituals have a potentially positive environmental impact below the ground.

"The preference for Jewish burials… is to have a simple, plain casket. While that isn't [intended] for environmental purposes, it does have the advantage of being more environmentally friendly than a finished casket that looks like furniture," which could leech small quantities of toxins into the soil as it begins to degrade, Speisman said.

Environmental group lists Israel's most polluted rivers

JTA

An Israeli environmental protection group has compiled a list of the country's most polluted rivers earlier this year.

According to Zalul's list, issued before Earth Day on April 22, the Lachish River, which runs between Ashdod and Ashkelon and flows into the Mediterranean Sea, is Israel's most polluted. Though most of the river is dry, what remains is primarily sewage and runoff from nearby factories and municipal waste management plants that have left bacteria and chemical levels in the river well above legal levels, the report said.

The Hadera River, near Caesarea, has been affected by wastewater treatment plant sewage, industrial pollution and contamination from the Palestinian territories, the group claims.

Others on the list included the Ayalon River near Tel Aviv, the Bsor River in the Be'er Sheva region and the Yarkon River, which runs through Ramat Gan, B'nei Brak and Tel Aviv.

Sixteen major rivers flow to the Mediterranean and 24 to the Jordan River, Lake Kinneret and the Dead Sea, and most are polluted, Zalul said.

Jordan River named one of world's 100 most endangered ecological sites

JTA

The Jordan River has been named as one of the world's 100 most endangered ecological sites. An environmental group blamed the poor co-operation between Israel and its Arab neighbors as one reason for the river's demise.

"The region's current policies treat the river as a backyard dumping ground," Friends of the Earth Middle East said in a June statement, blaming Israel, Syria and Jordan for diverting 90 per cent of the river's natural flow for domestic and agricultural use, replacing it with sewage.

Munqeth Mehyar, the organization's Jordanian director, told the Jordan Times that Israel and Jordan are not working together to preserve the river, as they promised in the Jordan-Israel Peace Treaty. The river has significance in Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Meyhar said the two nations shift the blame.

"When we talk to Jordanian officials they tell us if the Israeli side gives the go-ahead, then we will follow suit and vice versa," he said. "Meanwhile, nothing is done and the two countries continue to dump their waste into the river and divert water for agriculture."

Book interprets Bible text from an environmental perspective

He added that another environmental problem commonly associated with burial is the seepage of embalming fluid into the earth as a body decomposes.

But since embalming is not part of Jewish practice, it's not an issue at Jewish cemeteries, he added.

No specific Halachah re: cemetery maintenance

Even if there is no specific Halachah regarding the environmental maintenance of cemetery grounds, there are those who continue to push the community to interpret various biblical references in an environmental manner.

Canfei Nesharim, a New York-based group of Orthodox Jews dedicated to environmental education, continually interprets Halachah this way.

Its 2006 Compendium of Sources in Halachah and the Environment contains dozens of quotes and source material by rabbis and talmudic scholars for Jews wishing to follow a green code by interpreting Bible text from an environmental perspective.

One of the earliest quotes in the compendium, taken from the book of Genesis 1:28, casts an environmental light on the Torah, "And the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden to till it and keep [guard, protect] it."

Canfei Nesharim interprets this as an environmental tenet of Judaism.

"We must make use of the Earth's riches, but do so responsibly. And at the same time, we must appreciate our gift," writes Ilana Stein, a conservationist, and one of the compendium's contributors.

In the end, the group asserts, the Earth is humanity's "inheritance," to be diligently protected and cultivated according to God's directive. And a cemetery is likely no exception.

God created a perfect world that we must care for

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

And God said, "Let us make Mankind in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the birds of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps on the earth." Genesis, 1:26

"Behold My works, how splendid they are. All that I have created I created for your sake. Do not ruin or destroy my world. For if you do, there is no one to clean it up after you." Kohellet Rabba, 7:13

Compendium of Sources in Halacha and the Environment

These two statements, one from the story of creation in the Torah and the other from a midrash about God taking Adam on a tour of the Garden of Eden, show the two sides of the Jewish theological view of the relationship between man, God and the natural world.

On the one hand, God created a beautiful, perfect world and gave it to man, not only to enjoy but also to be in charge of. On the other hand, human beings, God warns, must care for it and make sure that this great gift is not squandered – that it will remain as a legacy for future generations.

While the above quotations speak in generalities, the Torah and commentaries have a good deal to say about the environment.

Toronto environmental consultant Shai Spetgang said that the Industrial Revolution of the 19th century has made the Earth less susceptible to some of the forces of nature.

For example, as Israel becomes more industrialized, and more land is covered with concrete, less rain can get down to the Earth, and the water table gets contaminated, Spetgang pointed out.

"From a purely selfish perspective, we all want clean air and water, and to eat non-poisonous food. This is not only for us, but for those who come after," he said.

It behooves us, then, to follow the precepts of the sages, which point us in the right direction, said Spetgang, the manager of membership services and the program development staff person at the Ontario Environment Industry Association and the executive director of the Canadian Environmental Markets Association.

The Messiah will come in time, but in the interim we need to do something about our environmental problems, Spetgang stressed.

Certain issues have surfaced in recent years. There are increased incidences of asthma in children, and people worry about the number of toxins they are exposed to.

Is a tomato infused with fish genes kosher? Some say that it is, since the fish genes bear no similarity to actual fish. The bigger issue, though, is whether we are allowed to manipulate nature.

Halachic sources are adaptable to today's world

It is important to note, in this regard, especially since the Human Genome Project deciphered the genetic code, that the manipulation of genes for medical or therapeutic purposes is not, by and large, considered problematic.

While halachic sources do not deal directly with such modern concepts as acid rain and recycling plastic, they are surprisingly adaptable to today's modern world.

The laws of schchitah, ritual slaughter, decree that animals must be killed in the most pain-free way possible, with one stroke of a specially sharpened knife by someone skilled in the process.

Canfei Nesharim, an organization of Orthodox Jews dedicated to teaching the importance of protecting the environment from the perspective of Jewish tradition and Halachah, has published a fascinating book, Compendium of Sources in Halacha and the Environment, edited by Spetgang and Ora Sheinson. It not only discusses how Judaism views the environment and our responsibilities but also gives extensive background and sources.

Shai Spetgang

Schchitah falls directly in the purview of the laws of tza'ar ba'alei chaim – kindness to animals. One must feed one's animals (including pets) before eating oneself; one must not cause them pain; and a hunter must not take a mother animal together with her offspring.

This recognition that animals have rights and needs not only ensures the welfare of the animals, but, the Torah says, several times, that if one observes these rules, "it will be good for you and it will prolong your life." (Devarim, 22:6). Being kind to animals, Halachah says, elevates both your physical and spiritual souls.

Bal Tashchit, the injunction not to waste or destroy, is particularly significant in terms of environmental responsibility.

From Deuteronomy 20:19-20, which says, "When you besiege a city for a long time… you shall not destroy its trees by forcing an axe against them," we get many rules. We are enjoined to not tear our garments in mourning more than the mandated amount or to destroy things wantonly – either belongings (such as clothes), food or natural resources.

While we wash for ritual purposes (such as before eating bread) or for cleanliness, we should not use more water than required or needed. Use low-flow toilets and taps, take shorter showers and always be conscious of the importance of conserving the world's natural resources.

The coming year is a shmittah year in Israel. The land must lie fallow, and what does grow we are not allowed to use. While this is basically a chok, that is, a law for which no reason is given, nevertheless it serves the purpose of renewing the health of the soil. Those experienced with farming know that farmers rotate the fields they use so that each year, one is fallow – much the same idea as shmittah.

We have a responsibility, say Maimonides, the Mishnah and other codes of law, to not throw stones on a public thoroughfare; to place dead animals, cemeteries and tanneries outside cities, and not the side that the wind comes from; and to work in such a way that dust or ash is carried out away from other people.

One must not, Maimonides says, soak flax near vegetable patches (the flax will destroy the vegetables) or dispose of dangerous objects where they will possibly hurt others.

There are even such seemingly modern considerations as keeping a greenbelt around a city and refraining from building in the public domain where the structures will obstruct traffic or block sunlight. Builders, the Torah commentator Rashi says, must begin to work immediately after construction materials are brought to the work site.

We must be conscious of both authority and responsibility, Halachah says – to be grateful to God for His goodness and to care for that which His goodness gives us.

Hadassah takes up environment mantle

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

Renowned for its work providing state-of-the-art medical care in Israel, Hadassah at its national convention last month focused on keeping people healthy by going green.

The Women's Zionist Organization of America urged the 2,500 members attending its annual assembly in New York to take up simple actions that could help save the environment and stave off global warming – for instance, turning off lights and buying more trees from the Jewish National Fund.

At the Hilton Hotel parley, several sessions on the environment included a talk by Rabbi Lawrence Troster of the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life.

"We brought to this convention the opportunity to become an activist on a personal level," convention chairwoman Barbara Spack said.

The organization's national director of advocacy, Shelley Klein, said the convention "was the start of mobilizing our grassroots to take this situation seriously."

"We have over 300,000 members in every state and every district, so for us, our strength is our people and our members," Klein said. "For us, the touchstone of our advocacy is our grassroots."

She said the nearly 100-year-old organization used the convention to see if global warming and the environment resonate with its members. The organization is working on position papers and starting to look at the issue on a policy level, Klein said.

Hadassah is also a partner in the United Nations Millennium Development Goals, an effort to provide education that would improve eight pressing areas by 2015: hunger, primary education, gender equality, child mortality rates, maternal health, HIV/AIDS, environmental sustainability and global development.

Klein called the environment a natural fit for Hadassah because of the biblical responsibility to use the earth's resources properly and a reduction in the dependence on oil would benefit Israel.

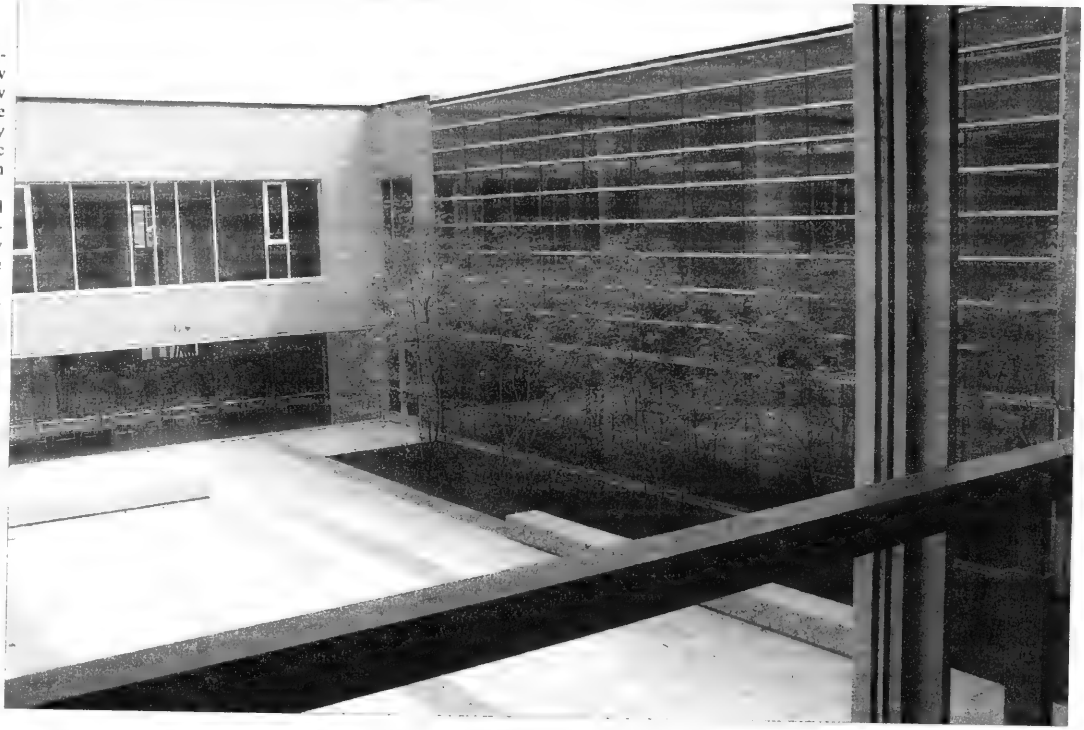
New CHAT building will be 'economical to run'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter



A view of the new school's interior courtyard [Frances Kraft photo]

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's new northern branch has become a de facto template for environmentally friendly design on the new Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

TanenbaumCHAT's Kimel campus – or TCK as school administrators have dubbed the new branch –will open its doors to more than 600 students on Sept, 4.

As the first building to be completed on the new campus, it's a sort of prototype for the environmentally friendly designs to be seen in other buildings slated to be built there in the coming years.

According to Lebovic project architect Guela Solow-Ruda, the idea of sustainability is "the essence of environmentally friendly design," and serves as a common thread throughout the campus. She said the complex has a central mechanical electrical plant and rooms that are designed to be shared to avoid duplication of facilities, so that they will be in use from early morning until late at night.

"It's allowed us to have great economies of scale, and this variety of use means that there's a great flexibility in design. On a more technical side, we have followed principles of LEED design [the internationally recognized Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design standards] so that we have received a grant from the government for exploiting energy efficiency and cost savings from that point of view," she added.

"And we have taken advantage on the technical side of all kinds of opportunities like in the design of lighting," Solow-Ruda said. "Certainly the design of the building puts us in a position where we're eligible to apply for LEED accreditation."

Lebovic is one of three Jewish "campuses" in various stages of development by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The northernmost of the three, located at the southwest corner of Bathurst Street and Lebovic Campus Drive (the continuation of Weldrick Road west of Bathurst), Lebovic will also include other schools, a Jewish community centre and organizational offices.

The boxy, rectangular, two-storey TCK building looks even larger than its approximately 110,000 square feet, because of an inner courtyard that the school is built around.

However, according to TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, Paul Shaviv – who has both a bachelor of arts and a master of arts degree in architecture from the University of Cambridge in England (predating his master's degree of philosophy in Jewish studies from the University of Oxford) – "we anticipate that even though it's a large building, it will be quite economical to run."

Materials are 'low-maintenance, hard-wearing'

As well, he noted, none of the capital costs of the building are being added to existing tuition fees.

The materials used in the $30 million building are all low-maintenance and hard-wearing, Shaviv said in an interview in his new office last week, as workmen hammered in the background, readying the school for opening day.

Heating, ventilation and electrical systems run on automatic controls, so that, in many rooms, when nobody is in them, heating, lighting and ventilation all drop down to minimal levels or go off completely, he added.

Entering one classroom, Shaviv triggered its overhead lighting and explained that the lights and heating are sensitive to motion.

Also, he added, the lights nearest the windows don't turn on unless it's dark outside.

The school is light-filled with large windows, and, "wherever you are, you always see from your space into another space or another program," said Solow-Ruda. "You constantly see views into the library, which is the heart of the school."

In that way, the architecture reflects the builders' and educators' philosophy.

"It's a light, airy, open school," said Shaviv. "We believe that echoes the philosophy and approach we wanted. We wanted the kids to come to an open, inviting, spacious area and transmitted that sort of message to the ethos and the environment."

From the inception of the planning process seven years ago, the whole Lebovic campus has been designed for minimum energy consumption, Shaviv said.

* * *

At federation's 26-acre "Central Square" campus, currently the home of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst north of Sheppard Avenue, plans are also afoot to implement green principles when building a new community centre and other buildings on the site, including a new Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Among these principles are:

1. Target to exceed building code minimums.

2. Utilize leading-edge technologies and building-automation systems to reduce energy costs. This will include heat-recovery systems in the pool, motion detectors for light shut-off, and other initiatives wherever possible.

3. Adopt a strategy to smart meter the building based on tenant occupancy to encourage energy efficient operating practices.

4. Select exterior light fixtures to limit light pollution.

5. The incorporation of a plant-filled "living wall" is being explored to improve interior air quality and enhance green awareness.

6. Maximize interior daylight to limit reliance on artificial light sources.

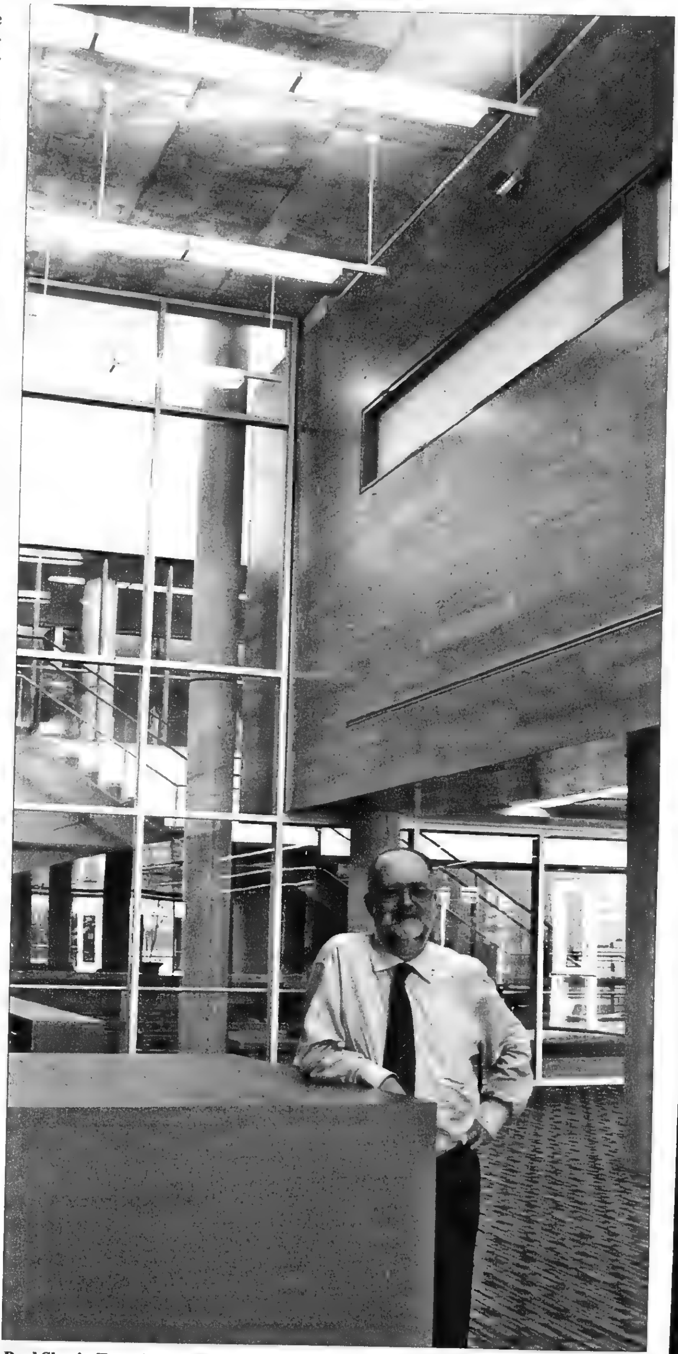
7. Select materials available locally wherever possible.

8. Consider life-cycle performance and longevity of all materials

9. Utilize indigenous plant materials in re-landscaping the site.

10. Develop a system of internal walkways and bike paths linked to the city network to encourage people to use alternative transportation.

11. Incorporate well-marked and comfortable pedestrian paths from transit.



Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, pauses for a moment in the new school library.

Lessons from a long-gone lake

By ZAFRIR RINAT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

With all the attention devoted to green cars, solar energy and the greenhouse effect, it has been somewhat forgotten that the main environmental threat affecting most Israelis directly is the loss of nature and landscapes.

It's a process that takes place almost daily when bulldozers bury a sand dune or churn up another swath of natural woodland to make way for a road, or destroy a winter reservoir in favour of a shopping centre.

The significance of this loss and the difficulty in correcting it are underscored in one of the saddest and most beautiful books published this year – the 50th anniversary edition of photographer Peter Merom's Song of a Dying Lake, reissued by the Israeli Defence Ministry. The book of black-and-white photographs, with texts edited by Yedidya Peles, documents the glory of Lake Hula and its loss.

Lake Hula – its southern section a lake, its northern section large swamps – was drained in the 1950s in the interest of agricultural development. The drainage operation was carried out without conducting a comprehensive study of its ecological, environmental and emotional ramifications.

Draining the lake later proved problematic for agricultural development as well: it caused fires on peat lands, sent ground pollutants flowing into Lake Kinneret, generated dust storms, and led to the spread of weeds and voles that damage crops. Neglect by farmers, because of assorted difficulties, exacerbated the situation.

'The desert offers no escape'

Numerous scientists have depicted the lake's animal life and vegetation, which was far richer than those in the Kinneret.

Merom describes this in his photographs, and the notes he made with Peles: "In the springtime the lake would transform. It would flood cultivated fields along its shore, cover them with fertile silt, and recede. The sun would come out and ripen the sediment-enriched cereals and corn. The water fowl would come and claim: this patch is ours, and the coastal birds would counter: it belongs to us."

Merom and Peles describe the draining and destruction of the lake with heartbreaking resignation. The photos document plants shrivelling up and dying, the carcass of a terrapin and birds desperately in search of water.

"Death got most of them – the desert offers no escape," the book says. "Cracked, parched earth cried out, as the lake's millions of creatures died with their mouths gaping open."

Merom thanked the lake for the days of its youth, and bid it farewell.

Today the Israel Nature and Parks Authority (INPA) takes pride in the Hula reserve, a remnant of the original lake salvaged by the founders of the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel, led by the late zoologist, Prof. Heinrich Mendelssohn (a fact the INPA neglects to mention at the visitor centre there).

The Jewish National Fund maintains the adjacent Lake Agmon, an area of the original lake that was re-flooded last decade.

These are undoubtedly important nature sites, but they can't take the place of more extensive ecological preservation activities that would bring back to life a substantial part of the lake.

Lake Hula can be further rehabilitated by flooding additional lands, which would restore at least part of the lost beauty. One of the ideas previously suggested by landscape designer Motti Kaplan, and rejected, was to restore the original state of a swampy northern region and partially reconstructed lake in the southern region.

Several scientists recommended in the past linking up the springs surrounding the Hula Valley with the areas to be reflooded, as well as to deliver better-quality water to the nature reserve.

Continuing to rehabilitate Lake Hula would make partial amends for the tragedy Merom depicted, and befits the statement appearing on the final page of his book: "Once upon a time there was a lake. Its story is over now, but not done with."

International scientists learn how Israel combats desertification

By AVI HEIN

When Mark Twain visited Israel in 1867 he described it as a "desolate country whose soil is rich enough but is given over wholly to weeds – a silent mournful expanse… we hardly saw a tree anywhere."

Making the desert bloom has been a core component of the Zionist ethos throughout the decades, and visitors to Israel in 2007 witness a landscape much changed over the 140 years since Twain's sojourn. Today, what was once desert is now forest, and where barren landscape once marred the horizon, flora and fauna fill up the landscape thanks to the Jewish National Fund.

Globally, however, fertile soil is rapidly turning into desert, and desertification – the degradation of land and the expansion of desert – is a significant global environmental concern.

Caused by natural climate change and human action, desertification leads to biodiversity loss and causes significant ecological damage.

Desert presently covers approximately 36 million square kilometres (22 million square miles) of the earth's surface area. It affects a combined population of 1.2 billion in more than 100 regions and has become a global problem looming over human subsistence and development.

In an attempt to combat the overall damage, scientists convened in Jerusalem earlier this year to learn Israel's techniques for making the desert recede.

The international conference, whose theme was "Forests to Combat Desertification," was sponsored by the Jewish National Fund, the Agricultural Research Organization of Israel, The U.S. Forest Service and two international consortia of forest scientists.

More than 150 researchers and foresters from Israel, the United States, Spain, Hungary, France, Japan, Germany and Australia held discussions, worked together and attended lectures in Jerusalem and the Negev to learn more techniques to combat desertification.

Aside from Israel, the only country succeeding in "shrinking the desert" is China.

"We're not the only ones to [combat desertification], but we definitely are the ones who really started it much earlier than anyone else," said Dr. Nir Atzmon of the Volcani Center and chair of the conference's scientific committee.

Topics covered during the conference included "Joint Efforts of Research and Demonstration in Arid and Semi-Arid Lands," "Nursery Techniques and Forest Establishment in Arid Zones," "Trees in Towns Improving the Quality of People's Lives," and "Livestock Grazing Management Tool vs Desertification Agent."

"We all agree that the main cause of desertification is human activity – the pressure on the land, the expansion of the population," Atzmon told ISRAEL21c.

Water supply plays a key role in reversing the process

He explained that land abuse causes land degradation, which leads to desertification. As a result of human activity, land that used to be productive becomes barren. Consequently, greater swaths of land are needed to produce agricultural yield or vegetation. Most desertification and forestry researchers are committed to the principle of sustainable development.

"We are trying to find ways that, on one hand, allow people to live and exist in this area, but on the other hand, don't allow them to abuse the land," Atzmon said.

Following lectures and practical classroom application, conference participants visited several reforestation sites in the Negev. On their journey from Jerusalem to the desert, the transformation from fertile farmland to dryland was apparent as soil and foliage grew sparse.

An hour into the ride, however, participants witnessed vast expanses of farmland and greenery. The guide told the group that prior to 1948, that area had been dry desert.

"Negev means desert," he said, "but today this entire area is green."

The secret to Israel's success, Atzmon said, is, as is the case with many other "success stories" in the Jewish state, that there is no alternative.

"We are a small country. We don't have much land. We know that we must take very careful care of it because we don't have anything else. This is what we have to live with, so we should take very good care of it."

Turning the desert into forest

In 1965, Joseph Weitz, then-director of land and forestry for JNF, stood in the Negev looking out over the surrounding desert and envisioned a vibrant forest. Those in his vicinity thought he was mad.

"How can you build a forest here in the desert?" he was asked. Today, his vision is called Yatir Forest, and it is Israel's largest forest.

According to Prof. Dan Yakir of the Weizman Institute of Science, the Yatir is the driest and harshest forest in the world. But despite the challenges, it is also one of Israel's most beautiful forests.

"This is afforestation, not reforestation," Prof. Uriel Safriel, a professor of ecology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, told conference participants. "There has never been a forest here. There has never been a woody ecosystem."

Because deserts lack water, the question of water supply plays a key role in reversing the tide of desertification and harvesting agriculture in arid regions.

One of the major sources of water for the Negev is recycled wastewater piped in from Tel Aviv. Whereas many other countries pour reclaimed water into the sea, in Israel, the water is used for agriculture and irrigation.

In addition to treated waste water, researchers are also using saline water from an underground reservoir for crop irrigation, although the high level of salt content makes it usable only for certain crops and plants. Flood water, diverted via a unique system of pumping and canals, is also used to water trees.

"The 21st century is going to be the water century for everyone in the world. Places have water shortages," said conference participant Dr. Dan Neary, a researcher with the U.S. Forest Service in Arizona.

Atzmon said Israel is a global leader in water harvesting and often sends experts abroad to teach others how to conserve and manage water.

"Israel has a lot of a lot of experience which we can really teach many others," he said.

Neary concurred, saying he has gained a great deal of knowledge from visiting Israel. "I'm just immensely impressed with your agriculture system, the way you're utilizing the desert," he told ISRAEL21c. "I mean, you have a small land area. We have a huge land area. I'm impressed with the conservation issues with your water – the use of different waste water practices. We don't tend to do that as much."

"A lot of people in the U.S. have read about Israel and its history, but until you see it, you just don't understand it," he said.

Avi Hein is a staff writer for ISRAEL21c, a media organization focusing on 21st-century Israel.

EMUNAH WOMEN - FRONT AND CENTRE

Emunah's presence in Israel is quite amazing and your support is what keeps it strong. Emunah's daycare centre in Beit Shemesh was awarded the Government Prize for being the best in Israel. In addition to the existing Crisis Centre, The Israeli Government has requested that Emunah establish a crisis centre for teenage girls. The daycare centre in Ashkelon is a multi-purpose centre, open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. and accommodates 40 welfare children, among others, and teaches mothers parenting and coping skills.

In Sderot, Emunah has established a trauma centre to help children and families in these critical times. Thirty-five families from Sderot are currently housed at Neve Michael. Emunah has also established two centers at Yad Binyamin for the evacuees of Gush Katif; seventy percent of the evacuees are still unemployed.

EMUNAH CANADA HAS PLAYED A SIGNIFICANT ROLE IN ALL OF THESE ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

Regional science fund proposed for Middle East

By BRETT KLINE
JTA

Ilana Meallem and Mazen Zoabi left a recent morning meeting with Jordan's King Abdullah II smiling. The king had just proposed the formation of a regional science fund, and they were certain they would have access to that fund.

The two Israelis, project managers at the Arava Institute, an environmental study and research centre in southern Israel, were among a small group of people in their 20s from Israel, the West Bank, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco and other Arab countries, attending a conference of Nobel laureates in Petra, Jordan.

Most of the media attention had focused on Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and other political leaders who came to the conference held in Petra in May and sponsored by Elie Wiesel's Foundation for Humanity and King Abdullah's Fund for Development.

King Abdullah, who had opened the gathering with a plea for more regional co-operation outside the realm of politics, saw this group as a good example.

"The king told us that we are the core of a new organization for youth exchange in the Middle East, and that there will be funding to organize regular meetings," Meallem said. "Israeli youths are full members in this organization. We have our full place here, and this is fantastic."

Indeed, some of the Nobel laureates and invited guests seemed to be more interested in the presentations by the young people, who fielded questions and took compliments, than in Israeli-Palestinian politics.

"We are the soldiers of tomorrow fighting for a healthier environment," Meallem told the conference. "We need you Nobel Prize laureates, and you need us."

> To sponsor environmental projects throughout the area

The Arava Institute has about 40 students, including three Palestinians from the West Bank and 10 Jordanians. They all live and study at the kibbutz centre on Kibbutz Ketura, about 25 miles north of Eilat. The institute is under construction to house up to 100 students in the near future.

The 10-year-old institute has graduated more than 400 students from its year-long program. It receives extensive funding from the Jewish National Fund and other American Jewish groups.

Among its graduates is the son of Jordanian Prime Minister Ma'roof Al-Bakeet.

The Israeli students are in a master's program at Ben-Gurion University in Sde Boker. Institute members organize an annual fundraising bike ride from Jerusalem to Eilat. This year's ride along the Dead Sea brought in $800,000 for the institute.

Until now, the Jordanians have not sponsored their own students at the Arava Institute, but at the conference, Jordanian Education Minister Khaled Toukan seemed open to the idea.

"Will the funding from Jordan follow?" Zoabi wondered. "I don't know, honestly, but I think it is in everyone's interest that [it does]."

Programs at the institute include examining pollution levels in trans-border rivers touching Israel, the West Bank and Jordan, probing air pollution in Jordan and a special two-year project with Morocco to cultivate argan almond trees that, until now, have grown wild only in southern Morocco.

Meallem, originally from London, England, and Zoabi, a Technion graduate from an Arab town near Nazareth in the Galilee region, are headed to China for three months. They will bring back technology for turning small-scale organic waste into energy, to be used in Bedouin villages in Israel, and later in Jordan and possibly the West Bank. The technology, known as biogas energy, is not uncommon, but apparently has been best developed for small-scale use in China.

"We don't yet have a partner for this with the Palestinian Authority," Zoabi said.

He and Meallem spent much of the conference networking.

Young people 'are fighting for a healthier environment'

"Perhaps we could do projects with you and get more Palestinians involved in your institute," Sari Nusseibeh, a leading Arab moderate and the president of Al Quds University outside Jerusalem, told them. "Maybe your generation can go beyond the politics that have dragged us all down."

In the air-conditioned, temporary conference hall not far from the path leading to the spectacular Nabatean ruins that have put Petra on the map, Nusseibeh was busy chatting with Yigal Carmon, the head of MEMRI: The Middle East Media Research Institute and a counter-terrorism adviser in the administration of the late Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin.

'Maybe your generation can go beyond politics'

"These environment projects are great for everyone because it is a win-win situation for all sides," Carmon said. "You see here that Jordanian politicians and various prize laureates and funders are very quick to speak with… others because it gives them a sense of doing something good for people in a concrete way. I think we have seen enough sessions on conflict resolution; the answer is more real projects."

Wiesel, the conference moderator and winner of the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize, said his foundation was ready to put up or raise $10 million for the regional science fund that was proposed by King Abdullah. The fund would sponsor projects proposed by groups throughout the region.

"I think the Arab countries are taking scientific co-operation with Israel very seriously," Wiesel said. "His Majesty the King is a true associate in this endeavour with the young people. He knows, and I know, that some of them will be the leaders of tomorrow."

Kholouel Al Dorghan, who is in her 20s and works in the Bank for Trade and Finance in Amman, said she was excited by the possibility of working in Israel.

"I met Israelis for the first time in my life here at this conference, and I felt a real buzz in the air here from the young people and the delegates," she said. "I would be happy to do research in the Arava Institute or anywhere in Israel."

Still, several young people who had been invited from other countries in the region preferred to remain anonymous.

"I would love to work with Israelis," one said, "but my government would not like that at all and would harass me and my family. There must be a way for us to participate as well. I am angry about this, but what can I do?"

A green bat mitzvah in time for Tu b'Shvat

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Jordi Klein doesn't want just another bat mitzvah party. The 12-year-old's birthday is in April, but she chose Jan. 26 as the date of her bat mitzvah because it's the closest date to Tu b'Shvat, the holiday of the trees.

Though plans have not been finalized, Jordi said her passion for environmentalism will shine through in every aspect of the event.

"Everything at my party will have a purpose and a meaning, and everybody can still enjoy it," she said.

At the bat mitzvah service at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Jordi plans to tie in the Tu b'Shvat theme to her dvar Torah. Guests will wear eco-suede kippahs, which feel like suede but are made from recycled cardboard.

For the party, Jordi's mother, Sandy, is working to have prizes and giveaways handed out in personalized enviro-friendly green bags by President's Choice, which can later be used for grocery shopping instead of plastic bags, and users can earn PC points.

Jordi became interested in the green theme after being dismayed by the waste of paper in flashier bar mitzvah invitations.

"These invitations were gorgeous – and they were – and my daughter would go, 'What a waste of trees,'" Sandy said.

"In our quest to find recycled paper, we found that [the Jewish National Fund] has invitations on recycled paper, and with every invitation, they donate a tree in honour of the guest. The money we would have spent on an expensive invitation, we spend on trees in Israel," she added.

"All my friends, they're interested in dancing or gymnastics… not that there's anything wrong with that. But this is what I'm into," Jordi said.

The Grade 7 student at Glen Shields Public School in Thornhill is active in Roots and Shoots (the children's branch of the Jane Goodall Institute), and is a scout with the Seventh Thornhill Scout Troop.

Bat mitzvah plans include eco-friendly invitations

"I thought if there's a chance that I could make my bat mitzvah as environmentally friendly, or as me, I guess, as possible, I wanted [to do it]."

"I wasn't surprised at all," Sandy said of her daughter's bat mitzvah ideas.

"She's interested in the environment and also interested in not doing what all the others kids do. She's the opposite of most kids who just want the party."

Heal the Planet

Jordi Klein holds accessories for her environmental bat mitzvah, including her invitation and label for the eco-suede kippot.

Jordi has attended Camp Shalom for the last three summers. Last year, she wrote a lengthy article for the camp's newspaper about how to respect the environment and keep the camp tidy.

"I was surprised how little my friends knew about the environment and easy ways to keep clean," she said.

"After [the article came out], it was actually really great everybody had recycling bags and garbage bags."

Riding a bike and saving the planet

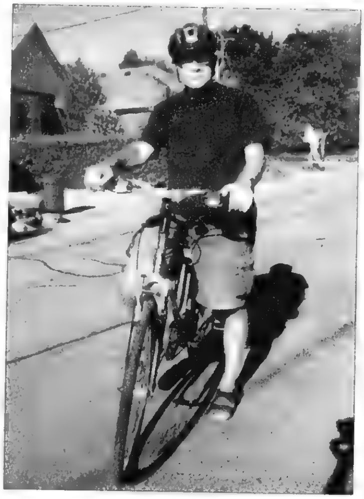
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When I was eight years old and summer was in bloom, my father bought me my first bicycle, a British-made Raleigh that he, as an immigrant tailor from Poland, could barely afford.

On the afternoon of his purchase, I accompanied him to Mount Royal Park in Montreal, my brand new, shiny bike in tow.

I got on the seat, and he pushed me off into the unknown. Being a neophyte to cycling, I feared I might crash. Luckily, my worst fear did not materialize as I rode into the distance, giddy in the knowledge that I had not failed.

In fact, I enjoyed this flight of freedom.



Cyclist Sheldon Kirshner
[Etti Kirshner photo]

Although I've forgotten many details of my childhood, I distinctly remember this incident, which stands as a watershed in my life. Since then, I have been cycling more or less regularly.

When I was a young father, in my late 20s and 30s, and domestic responsibilities seemed endless, my bike gathered dust. But since my two daughters have grown to maturity, I have had much more time to indulge in my passion for cycling.

In this environmentally conscious era, cycling is fashionable, all the rage. Everyone seems to be doing it, from your sister to your grandmother.

But for a long time, until about a decade ago, cycling seemed to be the preserve of mainly high-toned athletes or pimply nerds.

No more.

Now that we're attuned to the need to cut down on fossil-fuel emissions and nurture the environment, cycling is definitely in.

But as I just said, cycling has been second nature to me since I was a fuzzy-cheeked boy.

When I lived in Montreal, I would cycle all over the place. During that halcyon period, I also joined organized cycling tours in the Eastern Townships and Vermont. I recall these weekends with immense nostalgia.

For inescapable reasons, I never bothered to cycle in London when I was a post-graduate student there in 1969 and 1970.

And after moving to Toronto at the end of 1974 to take a job, I neglected cycling, being preoccupied by more pressing concerns and priorities.

In the mid-1980s, however, I rediscovered cycling, and have been an ardent cyclist ever since, having cycled not only in Canada and the United States but in Israel (where cycling is finally catching on), Vietnam, Laos, Germany, Austria and France as well.

Toronto weather being what it is, I can only cycle for about four months of the year.

I usually start in May, when the first real glimmerings of spring appear, and pack it in by early October, when the chill of autumn sets in.

By June, pedalling my silver Marin hybrid and leaving my Honda Accord in the garage, I'm in full swing.

Depending on the forecast, I ride to and from the office virtually every day, a combined distance of almost 30 kilometres. The trip from my home in the Casa Loma district to my office in Don Mills takes approximately 45 minutes.

Donning shorts, a jersey, sandals and a helmet, I pedal on quiet, tree-lined streets after negotiating the stop-and-start traffic of St. Clair Avenue East. Don Mills Road, the homestretch, is also invariably busy.

I cycle on flat roads, but occasionally there are hills to conquer. The drivers are usually considerate, but some are jerks, honking their horns, riding too close or, rarely, cutting me off.

I like the ride, the breeze caressing my chest, the fragrance of fresh leaves and wildflowers teasing my nostrils, but I could do without the acrid fumes from cars, buses and trucks.

As I swing into the parking lot area, where I lock my bike (Toronto, unfortunately, is the bike-theft capital of North America), I'm wet with perspiration.

But I feel strong and alert, eager to begin my day.

I'm not the only one in the office who cycles to work. My editor and colleague, Mordechai Ben-Dat, often rides in, as does reporter Paul Lungen. Occasionally, Vera Gillman, the advertising and assistant general manager, shows up, too.

I don't know how much I save in gasoline bills, but it can't be much after annual tune-ups and sundry repairs.

So let's be clear.

I don't pedal to beef up my bank account or retirement savings fund, but because I enjoy it and because it's good for my health and the environment.

Cycling is a synonym, really, for absolute freedom.

In the city, I'm like a king. I ride everywhere without being burdened by undue restrictions and traffic jams. When I'm in good form, I feel defiantly fit, as if I'm on a cushion of air. Sometimes, when the planets are perfectly aligned, I imagine that I've sprouted wings.

Two years ago, after having been diagnosed with borderline diabetes, I resolved to lose excess poundage. In this spirit, I went on a diet and picked up the pace of my cycling.

The regimen worked.

I lost about 20 pounds, and now I'm down to where I should be.

The state of the environment is also a consideration. If more of us cycled and left our cars in the garage during the summer, air pollution levels would surely be lower.

I'm pleased to say that my daughters, Mia and Lauren, are cyclists, too, though not to the degree that I have been in recent years. I take credit for their affinity to cycling. Maybe, in due course, my wife, Etti, will discover the joys of cycling.

We cyclists will not make any significant difference in rolling back the ravages of pollution. The automobile is simply too entrenched in our culture. But if more of us use our bikes to get places, we may yet make a humble contribution to saving the planet.

Hezbollah arsenal larger than year ago

By SHAHAR ILAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Ehud Barak told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee that Hezbollah has more rockets today than it did before the Second Lebanon War last summer.

According to a source who was present at Monday's meeting, Barak was referring to both long-range and short-range rockets, and said that the rockets are situated north of the Litani River, but within striking range of Israel.

Hezbollah fired almost 4,000 rockets at northern Israel during the 34-day war in 2006, and Israeli land and air assaults caused heavy damage to Lebanese towns and neighbourhoods.

The war was sparked by a Hezbollah attack on an Israeli border patrol in which three soldiers were killed and two taken captive. The fate of the captured soldiers remains unknown. More than 1,000 Lebanese and 158 Israelis died in the fighting.

Regarding the tense relationship between Israel and Syria, Barak said that he senses the tension between the two countries is beginning to dissipate.

An associate of the defence minister said it appears that Israel's tireless efforts to calm Syrian fears of an imminent conflict have finally taken effect, and now the Syrians view Israel as less aggressive.

Barak told the Knesset panel that he can see "similarities between the young [current Syrian President Bashar] Assad and his father [former Syrian president Hafez] Assad."

This was Barak's first appearance before the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee since he was appointed defence minister.

Barak outlined before the panel his general outlook on Israel's security, saying it was based on five major principles. They include operating an active anti-rocket defence system; improving the Israel Defence Forces' ability to manoeuvre in the realm of defence and protection; extending the IDF's logistical stamina in terms of supplies; increasing the number of training exercises, including live-fire training; and tackling the issue of the IDF's ability to operate deep within enemy territory.

Israelis in Peru to help quake victims

LIMA — IsraAID, the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, has sent a medical mission to Peru in the aftermath of the hurricane that struck the country earlier this month.

The seven-member IsraAID/First medical team is based in the village of Cerro Azul in the earthquake-affected region of the country, working in co-operation with the Catholic relief organization, CARITAS.

On Aug. 22, the team began its work in Canneta, and from there, branched out to various disaster sites. The group visited the town of Bella Vista and opened a medical clinic in a local school where 120 people were treated.

A field clinic was opened the next day in the village of Santa Barbara, where more than 150 people were treated. Water and electricity supplies were badly damaged in the village, and most of the houses in the area were destroyed, leaving families with only tents as shelter. The team also proceeded to Santa Cruz and opened the clinic in a local church, where they treated another 120 villagers and distributed food and water.

In the first 48 hours after the IsraAID team's arrival, close to 400 people affected by the earthquake were provided with medical treatment and emergency relief.

The team is working with volunteers from the Jewish community in Lima, who are escorting the Israeli delegation and helping with the logistics of the operation, including access and delivery of basic medical and relief supplies. The Jewish volunteers are also assisting with translations and contacts to local officials and aid groups.

IsraAID co-ordinates Israeli and Jewish organizations and other interested parties based in Israel who are active in development and relief work and are concerned about global issues.

The News in Brief

CANADA

1,900 Sign Petition

WATERLOO — The German Canadian Congress (GCC) has collected 1,900 signatures on an online petition urging the federal cabinet to change its mind and restore the citizenship of convicted Nazi collaborator Helmut Oberlander. It was revoked in 2000, but a Federal Court review overturned the decision and ordered cabinet to reconsider. He had his citizenship stripped for the second time this past May. A retired developer, Oberlander, 83, is accused of serving in a Nazi killing unit during World War II and lying about his past when he entered Canada in 1954. His supporters say he was a 17-year-old translator who didn't take part in killings. Oberlander's lawyer told the Kitchener-Waterloo Record he doubts cabinet will change its mind, but perhaps the petition will dissuade Ottawa from trying to block an attempt to have the decision judicially reviewed. The GCC hopes to collect 5,000 signatures by October, the Record reported.

Rappelling Rabbi

EDMONTON — Rabbi Daniel Friedman of Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton will be rappelling from the city's 27-storey Sutton Place Hotel on Sept. 10 to raise money for children and adults with disabilities. He had raised $1,600 as of last week.

WORLD

Documents Shared

BERLIN — The German-based International Tracing Service has given digital copies of millions of Shoah-related documents to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. The documents, from the archive at Bad Arolsen, come from 50 million records of deportation files, arrest records and concentration camp documents whose release had been sought for years. The museum received the files on behalf of the United States, one of 11 nations that control the archive. Yad Vashem received Israel's copy. But no documents will be available to the public until all 11 countries have consented, and France, Italy and Greece haven't done so. Though materials had been technically available to Nazi victims or their families, privacy laws in member states made it difficult to release documents to scholars and the public. Though the documents won't be immediately available, the museum said a list of their contents will be available on its website.

War Criminal Ordered Deported From U.S.

BOSTON — A Massachusetts man who belonged to a Nazi unit that helped liquidate the Warsaw Ghetto will be deported from the United States.

Vladas Zajanckauskas, 92, of Sutton, Mass., served at the SS base in Trawniki, Poland, and took part in the April-May 1943 operation dubbed "Operation Rinhard."

In a ruling this month in the case, which was litigated by the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, Boston Judge Wayne R. Iskra wrote that Zajanckauskas "admitted that Trawniki men sent to Warsaw stood in the cordon to prevent Jews from escaping."

They also "guarded the transit square where captured Jews awaited transportation to labour and concentration camps, conducted house-to-house searches for hidden Jews, skirmished with resistance fighters and took part in the shooting of some captured Jews."

Zajanckauskas was one of the "top-ranked" individuals in his sub-unit, the judge wrote.

Teen Attacked

MELBOURNE — A yeshiva student was the victim of an apparent anti-Semitic attack in Australia. Alon Tam, 17, was walking home from a kosher restaurant in a heavily Jewish suburb of Melbourne Aug. 18 when two men with baseball bats confronted him, then yelled, "Jew, you deserve to die," as they beat him. Tam sustained injuries to his torso, arms and shoulder. The incident began at the restaurant about 45 minutes before Tam was attacked. A worker said the men threw a chair through a window and punched a customer, then returned later and attacked Tam. More than 440 anti-Semitic incidents in Australia were logged in 2006.

Bank Removes Eagle

LONDON — An eagle emblem has been removed from the building of one of Britain's largest banks because of its Nazi connotations. Barclays removed the 3.5-ton eagle from atop its building, where it stood for 30 years, amid reports its new Dutch partner, ABN Amro, opposed the emblem.

Canadians mark Sar-El's 25th anniversary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Working in a dust-filled warehouse with no air-conditioning in the middle of an Israeli summer hardly seems like a life-altering experience, but for one Sar-El volunteer, that's just what it was.

Last summer, Toronto lawyer Jack Copelovici and his wife Ida decided to put everything on hold and spend three weeks in Israel doing grunt work as volunteers on an Israeli army base. They greased guns, loaded tanks, swept floors, categorized and grouped army uniforms.

Their volunteer stint coincided with Israel's battle with Hezbollah and fulfilled a promise that Copelovici made nearly 25 years before during an earlier war in Lebanon, when "I said to myself that when there's another war in Israel, I'll go over and see what I could do."

Copelovici raves about that experience and reprised it this summer. He and Ida travelled to Israel and met up with a number of friends they had made the year before through Sar-El, the national project for volunteers for Israel. Many of the people who were there in 2006 kept in touch over the year and planned a return visit together. The Copelovicis now count among their new friends Sar-El volunteers from the United States, Britain, Denmark, Finland and Australia, and they reconnected this summer at a new base – this one air conditioned – near Ramle.

[Photo courtesy Ida Copelovici]

There's now a group of 20 to 30 volunteers in their Sar-El community who co-ordinate their visits to Israel and who hope to meet again next year, Copelovici said.

While in Israel this summer, Copelovici also participated in the Aug. 9 celebration marking the organization's 25th anniversary. Jerusalem's Binyanei HaUmah convention centre was packed for the event, and participants were treated to a stirring program of song, dance, music and a tribute to Sar-El's founder, retired Gen. Aharon Davidi.

Len Berk, president of Sar-El Canada, has volunteered on Israeli army bases 10 times. He, too, was at the 25th anniversary celebration and, on behalf of Sar-El Canada, presented Davidi with a plaque indicating 100 trees had been planted in his honour at a Jewish National Fund forest in Israel.

Sar-El's 25th year has been one of the organization's better ones, Berk said.

"We're 60 to 70 per cent above last year. We might hit 200. That's my goal. I've decided that when we hit 200 volunteers a year, I'm retiring. So people can sign up and get rid of Len."

For Copelovici, the attraction of Sar-El is at least twofold.

"We felt we were actually contributing to an important war effort," he said. "Sar-El tells us the volunteers free up reservists and soldiers who can go to more active duty."

What's more, "the people you meet want to be there and have all kinds of different backgrounds. They want to work and do something for Israel. It's a very good feeling, a satisfying feeling. You're doing something concrete for Israel, even though it's a 'Joe job.'

In the heat of the day

From the editor's desk

The smoothly cut Jerusalem stone that paves all of the sidewalks and part of the roadways, and comprises the exterior of most buildings, was like silver paper reflecting back and magnifying in all directions the rays of the very hot sun over Jerusalem last week. By mid-morning, the thermometer had reached the mid-30s. It was very hot outside.

Air-conditioned sanctuaries such as shopping malls and hotel lobbies were abuzz with human traffic. So, too, were the roads, as most of the cars were also portable temples of cool-blowing air.

Yet the heat didn't seem to get in anybody's way.

In any event, as anyone who has ever navigated in and among the crowded, open-air stalls of the Machane Yehuda market off Jaffa Street knows, Israeli life does not appear to lend itself to the slow paces of heat-induced torpor.

There is simply too much going on at any given time – politically, diplomatically, economically, militarily, scientifically, socially and culturally – in this tiny country. And all of it is endlessly covered by the many highly competitive and diverse media outlets.

Moreover, the national temperament, if there is such a thing, is antithetical to tired, turgid movement.

But the same is not necessarily true when it comes to the thinking and analysis of policymakers and news commentators.

The national news page of a leading daily newspaper one day last week was illustrative of the country's loopy "political" thinking, in which everything old is new again and circles of logic are left perpetually unclosed.

There were four quite distinct but obviously related stories on the page, each leading to the next, and with the last leading back to the first in a through-the-looking-glass, head-scratching, I-must-have-missed-something kind of way.

The first story, highest on the page, informed readers that Fatah's armed wing, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, had launched a shooting attack the previous day against an Israel Defence Forces patrol near Ramallah in the West Bank. Less than 24 hours earlier, we read, the Brigades had abrogated the forswearing-of-violence-for-non-prosecution quasi-amnesty agreement they had made with Israel some weeks earlier.

The second story informed readers that the IDF had become more actively aggressive in the Gaza Strip these past two months under Israel's new defence minister, Ehud Barak, in trying to prevent acts of terrorism against the civilian population adjacent to the Gaza border.

In the preceding 72 hours, the article said, 12 Gazans had been killed in a series of IDF ground and air attacks. In the past three months, the IDF had undertaken some 80 operations against the squads of Qassam rocket launchers.

"Around 160 Palestinian gunmen have been killed since the beginning of the year," we read.

The article also informed us that IDF intelligence has concluded that "Hamas and Islamic Jihad have smuggled unprecedented amounts of weaponry into Gaza."

A third article dealt with a visit by the state comptroller, Micha Lindenstrauss, to the communities bordering Gaza.

"Lindenstrauss 'very worried' about security in Gaza periphery after tour of area" was the headline.

The headline suggested a broader exploration by Lindenstrauss into the general security situation along the Gaza border. In fact, however, his tour of the area was to examine the state of readiness of local schools to withstand Qassam attacks. The schools are slated to re-open Sept. 2.

Lindenstrauss was not impressed with what he saw. "The central government must do what it should be doing in a more substantial way. We must do more to save lives," the comptroller general told reporters.

At the end of his visit, he said: "We are leaving very troubled."

The cumulative news impact of the preceding three articles thus rendered somewhat incongruent the headline on the fourth story: "Peres says Olmert, Abbas in 'serious' discussions."

In advance of the American-backed regional conference to be held in November, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas have apparently been trying to conclude an agreement of "fundamental principles" regarding the possible shape of a final peace arrangement.

The article goes on to say that most officials downplay the likelihood of the two leaders being able to reach agreement on anything other than the "need to keep talking."

While Abbas' Al Aqsa Brigades were shooting at the IDF and while he was trying to assert his "government's" control even throughout the West Bank, what ability, one might ask, does Abbas have to enforce any agreement?

And while a substantial majority of Israelis continue to have very little, if any, confidence in Olmert, what moral – albeit not legal – authority does he have to negotiate "fundamental principles" of a possible final peace deal?

The heat does appear to have affected some of the political thinking.

HAPPY REUNION

Paramedic Jason Benaim holds baby Summer Cohen last week at an ambulance station at Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue. Summer's parents, Sheri and Marc, and their four other children were there to thank Benaim and his partner, Carole Smith, for helping to deliver Summer on July 25. The parents called 911 when they couldn't make it to Mount Sinai Hospital from their home in Thornhill. Benaim and Smith, who were featured in an Aug. 16 Heebonics story in The CJN on young Jewish paramedics, were called to the scene on Bathurst just south of Finch, and Benaim delivered the baby less than two minutes after arriving. It was his fifth delivery.

Rabbis set up committee on kashrut concerns

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Board of Rabbis has struck a committee to deal with concerns about the service provided by the Kashruth Council of Canada.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue and president of the board, made up largely of Conservative and Reform clergy, said the committee, chaired by Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation, was established in response to issues raised by local Conservative congregations.

Complaints about the council – commonly known by its hechsher COR, an acronym for Council of Orthodox Rabbis – run the gamut from access to service to the quality of mashgichim, he said.

For example, Rabbi Flanzraich said, some congregations have received phone calls from COR on a Thursday evening informing them it would be unable to provide mashgichim for Shabbat, and the synagogues may have been expecting hundreds of people for a bar or bat mitzvah.

"Eventually the problem was sorted out, but it created an air of unpredictability to an important aspect of congregational life," he said.

Armed with those concerns, he said, the committee was formed in order to speak to COR about these and other issues.

Rabbi Flanzraich said the committee, which has yet to meet with COR, believes that diversity and pluralism shape the fabric of religious institutions, and that it's not in their best interest to be served by an unrepresentative monopoly.

"We do appreciate and respect what COR does, but we would like to see it achieve a sense of transparency," he said.

This could be achieved, he added, by having a COR board of directors that represents a broader cross-section of the Jewish community.

"There is no transparency if the board's values are based on the standards of a single person or single organization. The idea behind transparency is compromise and reasonable balance. The board should not be led by the right or the left."

The nature of a communal organization is that it lends itself to a standard that is reasonable and rational, and based on Halachah, Rabbi Flanzraich said.

He also said he sees no problem in welcoming new hechshers into the city, "provided they are reliable and halachically trustworthy.

"New York has hundreds of hechsherim, and people do their research. They are well informed as to what best suits their level of comfort."

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich

Many people have accepted a new local hechsher, Mehadrin Kosher, supervised by Rabbi Moshe Levy of Nachal Yisrael, a small shul and beit midrash near Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue, Rabbi Flanzraich said.

"He is supervising [at least] six establishments and it does not sound like he is providing a lesser form of kosher supervision. People should be free to make their own decisions without the fear of public ridicule."

Rabbi Flanzraich stressed that he has a lot of respect for COR, "but having a number of [kashrut] organizations will not imperil anybody."

The Toronto Jewish community has grown tremendously, and it's far more diverse than it ever was, he said.

He noted that as the community has grown, most of its institutions have had to re-evaluate their procedures so that they fit the new reality.

"Almost every [Jewish communal] organization has gone through an internal audit to see how it can best serve the broader community."

Calls to COR for comment were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Jewish union local quits CUPE over Israel stance

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Members of a union local representing workers at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress have quit the Canadian Union of Public Employees in protest over CUPE's political stance on Israel.

After what the Jewish unionists characterize as a year of acrimony and fruitless negotiations, the 72 former members of CUPE 2063(a) finally de-certified from the national union on May 1, citing resentment and bitterness stemming from CUPE Ontario's Resolution 50, passed at the Ontario union's May 2006 general assembly.

The motion called for "boycott, divestment and sanctions to end Israel's apartheid practices."

The Jewish local had previously severed ties with the provincial wing of CUPE in 2003 over budding pro-Palestinian sentiment in the provincial union's delegation to CUPE's national conference that year.

Ninety-eight per cent voted to leave

It later affiliated itself directly with CUPE national, but it was unsuccessful in its efforts to have the country-wide body rescind the Ontario resolution.

This summer, Lil Nobel, former president of the Jewish CUPE local, helped re-organize her members into a new, self-contained union, the United Employees Association, and is its new president.

"They tried to get us to stay," Nobel told The CJN. "But as a membership, we couldn't stay in an organization that is against what we work for [at the federation and CJC]... Jews and Israel. Ninety-eight per cent of our membership voted to leave."

She added that the decision to quit CUPE was not taken lightly, as the local had been part of the union since 1972.

"The decision had nothing to do with the union's service. We left because of their political stance," Nobel said. "We wanted CUPE national to rescind the resolution... but that wasn't going to happen."

According to her, Paul Moist, national president of CUPE, recently offered to come speak to her local to discuss issues of "democracy" related to union policies in a last-ditch effort to retain the local.

"But it was too little, too late. Why didn't they talk to us before it got to this point?" Nobel asked.

Calls to Moist were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Sid Ryan, president of CUPE Ontario, said after the resolution was passed that it's "not an attack on Jewish people. It's [an objection to] the State of Israel's policies on Palestinians."

Nobel said her members would have considered staying in the union had the national leadership made Resolution 50 "a fair statement… not just about the Palestinians."

CUPE Ontario's Action Plan booklet for 2007 calls for members to continue "to work in coalition with community organizations and other union activists on a variety of struggles including… against the war in Afghanistan, Iraq, Darfur, violent repression in Oaxaca, Mexico, Haiti, Colombia and Palestine."

Spinning too close to demagoguery

The responsibility of public leadership is freighted with the compelling need to choose wise public policy, and equally, to set standards in elected office that promote ethics, dignity and mutual respect in public comportment as well as in public debate and discourse.

During an election campaign, alas, we generally see far lower standards of behaviour from our candidates for high office. There is as much theatre, and as many grab-the-headlines announcements, ear-pleasing 30-second sound bytes and tantalizing, high-impact photo opportunities as there is discussion of policy options. In addition, the rhetoric often overheats. Candidates and their media advisors spin their messages in directions that incline more to dark caves than to the light of open debate.

Such was the case last week in Ontario when Premier Dalton McGuinty trumpeted his unwillingness to bring qualified faith-based private schools under the public funding umbrella. He was reported to have said: "I'm hoping to grab Ontarians by the earlobes and say it's not just another election, it's not just business as usual, it's about the kind of Ontario [they] want. If [they] want the kind of Ontario where we invite children of different faiths to leave the publicly funded system and become sequestered and segregated in their own private schools, then they should vote for Mr. Tory" (emphasis added).

He continued: "If they think it's important that we continue to bring our kids together so that they grow together and learn from one another, then you should vote for me."

The language McGuinty used was calculated to evoke images of the broad public purse funding quasi-medieval, discriminatory castes of education, and to incite a fear about the dismantling of the current education system. Thus it was also offensive to the families of the 50,000 children currently enrolled in faith-based private schools. For the images the premier painted were a distortion well beneath the integrity of the man and his office.

Are children studying in publicly-funded Catholic schools sequestered and segregated in their own private schools? Of course not. Our open, diverse, multicultural society simply does not work that way. Rather, it was intended to work in a way that requires the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to be interpreted "in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians." Nor would the children studying in Ontario's other, non-Catholic, faith-based schools whose general studies curricula would be funded publicly be sequestered and segregated in their own private schools. Nor are the children in non-Catholic, faith-based schools in other provinces whose general studies curricula are currently being paid by the public.

One cannot hide unfair, unjust, preferential treatment with the scurrilous spinning of campaign rhetoric. In this case, it spun too close to campaign demagoguery.

25 years ago in The CJN

PLO chairman Yasser Arafat left Beirut by boat for refuge, it was speculated, in either Greece or Tunis. Lebanon had been his main base of operations for 14 years. Meanwhile, former Israeli chief of staff Gen. Chaim Bar-Lev told The CJN in Montreal that Israel would stay in Lebanon until a strong Lebanese government could keep remaining PLO and Syrian forces in check.

Day school funding and Jewish seniors

Your article "Liberals, NDP are no-shows at seniors' debate" (CJN, Aug. 23) provides an opportunity to highlight the often ignored but intense linkage between the issue of equal funding of faith-based schools and seniors' affairs. A solution to the tuition crisis at Ontario Jewish day schools will have a direct effect on the quality of life of the senior citizens of our community.

Currently, $8 million of UJA funds are used annually to subsidize the 40 per cent of parents who cannot afford full fees at day schools, with an equal amount being provided by the full-paying parents themselves for that purpose. This is not to mention the vast sums of potential charitable monies that are simply not donated to a myriad of wonderful causes by the parent body of day school students, as they try to balance their family budgets under the extreme pressure of tuition fees. A very conservative estimate would put the sum total of these funds at $30 million – a full 50 per cent of the amount raised by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto annual campaign.

A solution to the tuition crisis in Ontario day schools would free up these vast sums of money to be used for the benefit of our seniors, the poor and the vulnerable of our community, and Israel-related causes. This fact alone should give all members of our community ample reason to support the one party that has inclusive public education on its platform, whether or not they are directly affected by the situation.

Day school fees

While the article "Jewish day school fees on the rise – again" (CJN, Aug. 23) noted that tuition increases are again higher than the annual rate of inflation and that the heavy financial burden on Jewish families will only be reduced once the Ontario government funds Jewish schools, I was very surprised that the article did not tie in the upcoming provincial election.

Ontario is the only province that funds one religion to the exclusion of all others. To date, only the Progressive Conservatives, if elected, would allow Ontario's non-Catholic faith-based schools to be part of the publicly funded education system in the same way as our Catholic schools are, while the Liberals and NDP support continued funding of our Catholic faith-based schools alone.

Sharon Dagan

Improve supplementary schools

The campaign for extension in Ontario (beyond Catholic schools) of public funding to faith-based schools is wrong-headed. Ontario should follow the recent examples of Quebec, Newfoundland and Labrador and have the constitution amended so that Ontario Catholic schools are no longer funded by the province. On balance, the Ontario Jewish community will not benefit from the funding of faith-based schools. Such funding will produce home-grown Jew-, Christian- and Hindu-hating, jihad-spouting fanatics at public expense. Jewish education would be better served by concentrating on vastly improving afternoon Hebrew schools.

An award-winning Jewish paramedic

Thank you for the article on the Jewish paramedics, although it only touched on the tip of this paramount profession. ("Young Toronto paramedics – sirens, lights and stretchers," CJN Heebonics, Aug. 16).

We wish to enlighten you on another one of the "handful of Jewish paramedics," our son, Harry Levinter. Harry has been with Toronto Emergency Services for more than 27 years. He pioneered Toronto's first advanced life-support program at Sunnybrook and Toronto General hospitals in 1983.

Harry's direct services to the public include not only providing the ambulance service, but also bike patrols at Toronto street fairs, the Canadian National Exhibition and any other gatherings where a vehicle can be used only on the venue perimeter.

A few years ago, Harry was asked to help teach a continuing education program that is run by the EMS educational division. Currently, he writes, produces and teaches some of the programs.

Harry received the EMS Exemplary Service Medal in 2005 and the EMS Employee of the Year award in 2006. As a gitta neshuma who has always put the welfare of others as a primary concern, he has chosen his profession well.

Just mention Harry to any of the paramedics in the city and behold the reaction. We are so proud of him, our Jewish paramedic, one of the "handful"!

Netanyahu confronts the Feiglin factor

'Bibi' seeks to maintain control of Likud as right-wing rival gains strength

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

JERUSALEM — After his overwhelming victory in the Likud's leadership primary earlier this month, Benjamin "Bibi" Netanyahu might have felt that he was well on the way to succeeding Ehud Olmert as prime minister. For months he had been leading in polls for the premiership, and he was now seemingly in control of his party.

But the strong showing of Moshe Feiglin, a radical right-wing rival for the party leadership, who won almost a quarter of the Likud vote, could seriously hurt the former prime minister's chances in the national arena.

The calculation is simple: to regain the premiership, Netanyahu needs to take votes from the centre of the political spectrum. But Feiglin's brash anti-Arab and anti-liberal stance could frighten the centrists away.

Benjamin Netanyahu

[Israenet photo]

Netanyahu's strategy in the face of the "Feiglin problem" is two-pronged: he is seeking ways to eject Feiglin from the party or at least to sideline him and his extremist "Jewish Leadership" group; at the same time, he is trying to forge high-profile political alliances with moderates, such as former finance minister Dan Meridor.

Whether the Likud is identified with Feiglin or with Meridor could make all the difference in the next election.

Netanyahu won the party leadership election with 73.2 per cent of the vote, followed by Feiglin with 23.4 per cent and Dani Danon, chairman of world Likud, with 3.4 per cent. In his victory speech, Netanyahu made it clear that he saw the results as a stepping stone to the premiership.

"Tonight the internal contest is ended and, as of tomorrow, we will focus our efforts on bringing a new leadership to Israel," he declared. But the fact that one in every four Likud voters backed Feiglin means the internal contest is far from over.

If Feiglin is able to control a large segment of the party, the Likud will be forced much further to the right than Netanyahu would like. The end result would likely be a party with a radical right-wing image that most Israelis would not be comfortable with and, more importantly, with a new internal balance of power, in which party leaders and Knesset hopefuls would have to deal with and in some cases defer to Feiglin and his extremist ideology.

"If people need Feiglin's votes to get into the Knesset, the Likud leadership will start speaking Feiglinish. And if it speaks Feiglinish, that will reduce Netanyahu's chances of being prime minister," wrote Nahum Barnea, senior political analyst for the mass circulation daily Yediot Achronot.

Feiglin burst onto the political scene in the mid-1990s as one of the leaders of Zo Artzeinu, a protest group determined to block the Oslo peace process. One of his tactics was to stage mass sitdowns on major Israeli highways, bringing traffic to a stop across the nation. He was arrested and convicted of sedition, for which he spent six months in jail.

In 1998, after then-prime minister Netanyahu signed the Wye River agreements with the Palestinians, ostensibly continuing the Oslo process, Feiglin formed "Jewish Leadership," a radical ideological group that advocates holding on to all of the land of Israel, encouraging non-Jews to emigrate, denying Arabs the right to serve in the Knesset, weakening the Supreme Court, pulling Israel out of the United Nations, establishing a leadership of religious believers and creating a "more Jewish" Israel. Feiglin called it a profound expression of the Jewish spirit; his critics denounced it as a form of Jewish fascism.

In 1999, Feiglin played his master-stroke: the movement's members, nearly all Orthodox settlers, joined the Likud en bloc. Aware that an extremist movement of the type he led stood no chance on its own, Feiglin planned to take over a large established right-tending Israeli party from the inside. If successful, he argued, he could even become prime minister.

His progress has been rapid: In the 2002 leadership primary, he polled only three per cent of the party vote; in 2005, 13 per cent; and, now in 2007, more than 23 per cent. Many concerned Likudniks have likened Feiglin's activities in the party to a "hostile takeover."

Netanyahu is well aware of the danger. A few years ago, he was not averse to making deals with Feiglin to embarrass then-party leader Ariel Sharon. Now he is doing all he can to keep the right-wing radicals at arm's length. During his victory speech he gave orders to keep Feiglin and his supporters out of the hall.

Likud authorities have tried to clip Feiglin's wings in the past. In the run-up to the last Knesset election, they passed a regulation to prevent him from appearing on the party's Knesset slate. It stated that anyone who had spent time in jail in the past seven years could not run on the party ticket. Feiglin's jail term for his Zo Artzeinu activities ruled him out.

Now Netanyahu is looking for legal grounds to expel Feiglin and the entire Jewish Leadership group. One possibility would be their support for Israeli soldiers refusing to evacuate settlers, which contradicts the Likud's blanket opposition to refusal. Another is the fact that in the last Knesset election, many of the Jewish Leadership people, although registered members of the Likud, did not vote Likud. In some predominantly Jewish Leadership settlements with well over 100 Likud members, only a handful actually voted for the party.

The Likud, badly hurt by Sharon's breakaway to form the centrist Kadima party in November 2005, won only 12 Knesset seats in the March 2006 Knesset election. But a number of major developments that year restored the Likud's political fortunes: the rocket fire on nearby Israeli towns and villages following the withdrawal from Gaza; the eventual takeover of Gaza by Hamas, and Olmert's poor performance in last summer's war with the Hezbollah in Lebanon. All three developments served to undermine Kadima and make Netanyahu the favourite to win the next election.

That is until Ehud Barak's election as Labor party leader in July and Feiglin's high-profile performance in the subsequent Likud vote. Where a few months ago polls had Netanyahu well ahead of any rival for prime minister, now he trails both Barak and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, should she take over from Olmert as Kadima leader. In a three-way race, a recent poll had Barak at 32 per cent, Netanyahu at 30 per cent and Olmert finishing last with just 5 per cent. But if Livni becomes the Kadima candidate, she polls 29 per cent, with Barak and Netanyahu both trailing at 24 per cent.

What these figures show is the vital importance of the centrist vote. And if Netanyahu hopes to win his way back into the Prime Minister's Office, he will have to find a way to get free of Feiglin.

Anti-boycott reaction expected

Organized attempts to boycott Israeli academics and the institutions that employ them were first seen in 2002. At the time, two British professors, and the signatories to their petition, called – unsuccessfully – for the European Union to refuse travel and research grants to Israeli applicants, "given Israel's attitude toward the Palestinians."

Lawrence Hart
in Hamilton

Then, in May 2003, a motion promoting an academic boycott against Israel was endorsed by about one-third of eligible voters at the annual meeting of Britain's Association of University Teachers (AUT). By April 2005, AUT's appetite for censuring Israelis had grown, enabling their executive to push through a resolution to boycott Haifa and Bar Ilan universities. However, within just one month, opposition to the association's action became so intense that plans for ongoing sanctions were abandoned.

What distinguishes the current proposed boycott from its predecessors is its relative longevity. Spawned by delegates at a conference of the University and College Union (UCU) in Bournemouth, England, at the end of May, it appears that the UCU governing council may be willing to stay the course even in the face of unprecedented protests both from within the academic community and outside of it.

On Aug. 8, a full page advertisement appeared in the New York Times, listing the names of the presidents of 286 American colleges and universities who had come out publicly against the UCU action.

In addition, more than 11,000 academics from around the world have signed an on-line petition, declaring that they would "decline to participate in any activity from which Israeli academics are excluded".

Here in Canada, an initiative to encourage our university leadership to express opposition to the boycott has been remarkably effective. To date, the presidents of 24 universities have issued strongly worded statements, many of them focusing generically on the obvious threats to academic freedoms that are so intertwined with the UCU's boycott demands.

But notwithstanding the principled stances already adopted by the heads of academe in the United States, Canada, and elsewhere, the real test of the anti-boycott movement's backbone will come in early September, when schools reopen after their summer vacations.

Already the Coalition against Racial and Ethnic Discrimination at Queen's University has accused university principal, Karen Hitchcock, of "hypocrisy" for denouncing the boycott, while at McMaster University, president Peter George has been similarly criticized by the group McMaster Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR).

Much more of this should be expected once the usual anti-Israel groups on campus regain their momentum, which they almost certainly will. It will then be up to faculty and students who recognize the idiocy of the boycott call to take a meaningful stand against it – and for university presidents to maintain their resolve and boldly defend the positions they've so recently articulated.

U.K. boycotters ignore facts – and people – on the ground

Nearly 300 American university presidents recently took a bold stand in stating their opposition to the vote by the British University and College Union to urge its members to consider a boycott of Israeli academic institutions.

In a recent ad sponsored by the American Jewish Committee, these university leaders not only threw their support behind their sister institutions in Israel, but they did so by telling their counterparts in Britain that "if you discriminate against Israeli academics, then you effectively discriminate against us."

Nancy Falchuk
in New York

Much has already been said on both sides about the tactics of boycotting Israeli academic institutions. But the one element that has been missing from the debate is the sheer irony of marginalizing and ostracizing those on the ground in Israel who are the only people in the world with the ability to change the situation for the better.

The Hadassah Medical Organization, founded and funded by Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, is an academic centre in Jerusalem that consists of two hospitals and, together with Hebrew University, runs five academic medical schools. Our university medical institution not only teaches our medical professionals the tools of their trade, they teach them its ethics.

They did not let politics onto our premises when we saved lives of Palestinian suicide bombers who were injured while assassinating hundreds of Israelis during the two intifadahs. They do not let politics in the door when they save lives of Palestinian babies with severe heart defects. They ignore politics when they conduct numerous collaborative research and clinical projects with Palestinian physicians and other health professionals in a variety of medical and health areas.

Hadassah considers it our mission to serve as a bridge to peace by forging links between people of all nationalities, races and religions who come through our doors for healing. Here are just a few ways our teaching hospitals do that:

- The Hadassah Medical Organization has committed itself to train staff and provide expertise to assure appropriate quality oncology services at the Augusta Victoria Hospital, a Palestinian hospital that is developing a cancer center to serve patients from the West Bank and Gaza.
- Some 30 physicians from the West Bank have already completed ongoing training at Hadassah to provide improved medical care in their villages.
- Hadassah has been working to improve trauma care in the region and to improve communications between trauma care professionals by knowing each other as individuals.

Any decision to boycott Israeli academia would include Hadassah, and all its medical and research personnel. These are not just Israeli Jews and Arabs, but Palestinian physicians, nurses, social workers and other health professionals who work at Hadassah and consider it their professional home.

A boycott by the British Academic Union would mean blackballing the small, but real, steps the Hadassah Medical Organization makes every day toward peace in the region.

And Hadassah is not unique: there is not an Israeli teaching hospital that does not do the same.

Just as 300 American universities proudly identify with their colleagues in Israel, the medical and educational personnel at Hadassah Medical Organization identify with their Palestinian partners with whom they collaborate. We strongly urge the members of the British University and College Union to do what academics should do: closely examine the facts, then make an informed decision. We believe if they do so, they will drop their damaging actions and join the family of those who work with each other and empathize with each other to heal the Middle East and the world.

Nancy Falchuk is national president of Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America.

The sabbatical year in Israel

After spending more than 25 years as an Israeli, with the constant pressures and tensions, I find that it's sometimes necessary to take a step back and remember what we – as Jews – are doing here. Watching the news and listening to the obsessive focus on the conflict, the joys of daily life, particularly in Jerusalem, are often neglected or forgotten.

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

The yearly cycle of holidays provides us with the opportunity do to just that. Every year, at the beginning of the month of Elul in the Jewish calendar, the preparations for Rosh Hashanah and the High Holy Days start in earnest. In many neighbourhoods, you can hear the sound of shofar practice after morning services, a harbinger of the upcoming days of reckoning.

Next year – 5768 in the Jewish calendar – is also the seventh of the seven-year agricultural cycle in the Bible, when, in theory, the fields in the Land of Israel are not worked, and the produce that grows unattended, is to be shared equally among all. During the many generations and centuries of exile, this commandment was simply a historical relic, a reminder of the vulnerability and dependence of the human condition. In modern times, the symbolism of the sabbatical year (shmittah) is also a central element of Jewish environmentalism.

But now, with the revival of Jewish sovereignty in the Land of Israel, the shmittah year has become a real issue. To live as a free people in our ancient homeland means deciding how to relate to the commandments and practices that have been dormant for so long. Since the beginnings of the Zionist movement and the resettlement of the Land, shmittah has one of the most complex religious, philosophical and economic issues that religious Israelis wrestle with. These discussions and debates dominate the pre-Rosh Hashanah agenda in Jerusalem and elsewhere. It's one of the privileges and joys of being an Israeli.

More than 80 years ago, as Jewish agriculture expanded in Israel, the rabbis agreed that it was impractical to follow the letter of the law and let the fields lie fallow for a year. One solution was to adapt the practice used before Passover, by using a framework of fictitious sales of the fields to non-Jews, so that growing food during the year would not be a technical violation of religious law. Another approach was to import fruits and vegetables from Arabs in the region for the year.

But both "solutions" are inconsistent with Zionism, and violate the environmental and social principles behind shmittah. Indeed, selling the land to non-Jews, or being dependent on them for food, even as a fictitious detour to get around the letter of the law, is precisely the opposite of the core values of Jewish sovereignty.

As a result, many religious (or traditional) Israelis are examining alternative approaches to return to the original purpose, and avoid working (as well as selling) the land during the sabbatical year. Reviving the ancient custom, a national group is signing up kibbutzim and other producers to provide their harvest from seeds planted before Rosh Hashanah and their perennial produce (from fruit trees and similar crops) to co-operative markets, in exchange for modest payment for working as officers of the co-op. The produce, in turn, will be made available to families who have signed up and purchased "shares" in the co-operative framework. Prices will be fixed and volume allocated on the basis of need.

This is a limited solution, and will have to be supplemented by crops from the Golan Heights, Jordan Valley and other areas traditionally exempted from the biblical boundaries, as well as imports. (Most of the wheat and other grains are imported from abroad anyway.) But the important result is to revive the religious, environmental, social and economic principles behind the concept of a sabbatical year in modern Israel.

The Kirshner File

A year after the Second Lebanon War

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Say what you will about his political motives, but Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's recent assertion that the Second Lebanon War restored quiet to Israel's northern border is really true. Olmert, of course, had reason to put a positive spin on things. Last spring, the Winograd Commission issued a scathing interim report about his government's less than stellar handling of the 34-day war, which pitted Israel against Hezbollah and, much to Israel's frustration and concern, ended on an inconclusive note.

It is clear that the conflict – which cost Israel 119 military and civilian casualties, inflicted property damage running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, possibly eroded its deterrent capability and probably emboldened enemies such as Iran and Syria – damaged Olmert.

Yet a year to the month after the Israeli and Lebanese governments agreed to observe United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701, which was unanimously adopted on Aug. 14, 2006, Israel's heretofore volatile border with Lebanon has been stabilized.

With Hezbollah having been pushed to positions north of the Litani River and no longer maintaining a line of fortified bunkers and posts along the border for the first time since Israel unilaterally pulled out of its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon in May 2000, the residents of northern Galilee can breathe easier.

Add to that the fact that the vacuum has been filled by the Lebanese army and the United Nations' peacekeeping force, UNIFIL. Acting under international pressure, Lebanon now deploys 15,000 troops, while UNIFIL, which has been patrolling the frontier area since Israel's mini-invasion in 1978 (Operation Litani), currently has 13,000 men under arms in a supporting role.

Neither the Lebanese army nor UNIFIL actually enforces the security measures in Resolution 1701, as the Israel Intelligence Heritage and Commemoration Center noted in a report released this month. The region immediately north of the Israeli border has not been demilitarized and Hezbollah still maintains an unobtrusive presence.

Nonetheless, Hezbollah has not launched a single attack, not even in disputed Shebaa Farms, since last year's truce went into effect. Hezbollah's year-long abstinence is unprecedented, but real peace has yet to be achieved. There was a minor clash between the Israeli and Lebanese armies last February, and a roadside bombing killed six members of a UNIFIL patrol more than two months ago. And this past June, unidentified terrorists fired 107 mm rockets into Israel that landed in Kiryat Shemona, causing property damage. Significantly enough, Hezbollah denied any involvement in the attack. Some observers claimed that it was the work of Al Qaeda's surrogate in Lebanon, Fatah al-Islam, which has fought fierce battles with the Lebanese army in the north of the country.

Prior to last summer's war, Hezbollah irregularly attacked Israeli forces in Shebaa Farms, which the United Nations described as Syrian territory but which Hezbollah insists is Lebanese. In attacking Israel to highlight Lebanon's claim to Shebaa Farms, Hezbollah shelled army outposts, fired at patrols and at reconnaissance aircraft and tried to kidnap soldiers. Israeli casualties were minimal compared to the period before Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon. On average since its 1982 invasion of Lebanon, Israel lost about 20 soldiers per year in combat situations, while losing less than a dozen from May 2000 to June 2006.

Recently, Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, who claims that Hezbollah scored a "divine victory" in last year's war, announced that he has no interest in engaging Israel in another round of warfare. But he warned that nasty "surprises" await Israel should a war break again and boasted that Hezbollah, which hit Israeli urban centres as far south as the outskirts of Hadera, has the ability to strike any city or town in Israel. As he put it, "Even in the months of July and August 2006, there was not one place in occupied Palestine that we could not reach. I stress that we can do this today as well."

Israeli army officers on the northern front share the assessment that Hezbollah is content with the status quo, at least for the present. According to observers, Hezbollah – which lost about 650 of its fighters during the war, according to Israeli estimates – needs tranquillity to rehabilitate its forces without interference from Israel, the Lebanese army and UNIFIL. In addition, Hezbollah prefers to focus on its current struggle with the pro-western Lebanese government led by Prime Minister Fuad Siniora. Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, wants greater influence in the affairs of state, but Siniora is balking, and the impasse has concentrated minds in Hezbollah's leadership.

Yet Hezbollah is quietly rebuilding on all fronts. Last spring, Hezbollah's deputy secretary general, Naim Kassem, admitted that Hezbollah is rearming. Around the same time, Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi – who succeeded Gen. Dan Halutz as chief of staff of the Israeli armed forces following last year's war – said that Hezbollah is trying to restore its prewar capabilities and arsenal.

On the eve of the war, Hezbollah had more than 20,000 Syrian and Iranian-made rockets of various ranges. Israel destroyed hundreds, if not thousands, of them, but now believes that Hezbollah has replenished its stocks.

The resupply effort has reportedly been undertaken by Syria and Iran in direct contravention of UN Resolution 1701. It is possible that Hezbollah has also received Iranian missiles that supposedly can penetrate the armour plating on Israel's Merkava tanks.

Last March, reacting to reports that weapons have reached Hezbollah through the Syrian border, United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon said, "Such transfers are alleged to be taking place on a regular basis." As a result, the UN sent a team to Lebanon to investigate, and Ban called for the full implementation of Resolution 1701.

On June 26, Ban, having received the findings of the inspection team, said that Lebanon's border with Syria is completely porous and open to the smuggling of weapons and other goods. He urged Damascus to stop the traffic in illegal arms.

To no one's surprise, Syria denies the charge. But the United States – which has accused President Bashar Assad's Baathist regime of gross interference in Lebanon and permitting anti-American insurgents to cross into Iraq from Syrian territory – is convinced that there is clear evidence of arms smuggling across the Syrian border.

Gen. Yossi Baidatz, the head of the research division of Israeli military intelligence, claims that Hezbollah is rebuilding its forces south of the Litani River. The UNIFIL commander, Gen. Claudio Graziano, has dismissed the claim, saying that Hezbollah has not rebuilt its military infrastructure there. Amid the uncertainty, the Sunday Telegraph newspaper published a story in a recent edition claiming that Hezbollah, in an attempt to improve its capabilities, has purchased large plots of land north of the Litani River, where its operatives are undisturbed by the Lebanese army or UNIFIL.

In light of these developments, Israel pressed for new rules of engagement so that UNIFIL would be granted permission to take a more proactive role against Hezbollah and expand its field of operations from open areas to cities and towns.

Since the Lebanese government was staunchly opposed to the idea, UNIFIL was not given such authority. Israel relented, having been informed that neither the United States nor France supported its proposal. This may come back to haunt Israel.

Kids 'should be happy,' new principal says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Howard Laderman may be, as he puts it, a "tie guy" who likes to wear suits, but the new principal of Leo Baeck Day School's northern campus in Thornhill believes that his job should be fun and that students at the school should be having fun, too.

"Every time a kid walks out of school at the end of the day, they should be happy, celebrating the things they learned and the friendships they made," he said in an interview last week in his new office. Laderman, who will be 57 on Sept. 7, retired earlier this year from the Toronto District School Board, where he served most recently as principal of Samuel Hearne Senior Public School in Scarborough. He takes over his new position from Jan Lapedus, who has retired.

Laderman, a Toronto native who attended Cedarvale Public School and Northern Secondary School, says that being at the Reform day school is opening the door for him to get back to his Jewish roots (he grew up at Beth Sholom Synagogue) and also to take on new challenges.

After he earned his undergraduate degree in urban studies and geography from York University, his wife Heather (then his wife-to-be) suggested that he follow in her footsteps and become a teacher, because of a dearth of jobs in his field.

Once Laderman started his B.Ed. studies at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, "the bug hit me" and he found he had an aptitude for teaching.

In 1984, he received his master's degree in education from Niagara University in Niagara Falls, NY., and four years later, after receiving his principal's qualifications from York University, he made the switch from classroom teacher to school administrator.

Laderman describes his administrative style as easygoing. He believes in creating a "warm, welcoming family environment" and an atmosphere of trust among staff and students alike.

He believes in creating a warm, welcoming family environment

At the same time, he believes in setting "high standards for everybody, especially myself. I try to model the behaviour I want from the kids." He also believes that active listening promotes understanding. "I believe that in partnership you can move forward."

As well, he favours "a lot of direct interaction" with students.

Among the photos decorating his office are some shots taken when he left Toronto's Duke of Connaught Junior and Senior Public School three years ago. They show a multi-cultural group of about 1,000 smiling kids, holding large placards that spell out, "We love you, Howard."

"That was my goodbye present," he recalls.

Howard Laderman

At Leo Baeck, which has 500 students at Laderman's branch, he plans to become involved as quickly as possible in as many areas as possible. "I plan to be very visible out in the halls, in the classrooms, at board meetings, sporting events and parents' association meetings, and I plan to be very accessible," he said.

He also plans to be a "supporter and driving force" behind the school's International Baccalaureate program. Last year, the school was accepted as a prospective member of the International Baccalaureate Organization for its middle years program, the beginning of a process of full certification by the prestigious organization.

"I'm coming in to build upon the history of this school and take it where the director [David Prashker] wants to go."

Outside of school, the father of two grown children is involved in diverse endeavours, too.

He has managed youth hockey and soccer teams, and, more recently, has become involved with a congregation in Ajax. A woodworker who has made and sold more than three dozen rocking horses and about 75 mailboxes, Laderman is also into photography, writing, drawing and painting, and playing the drums.

Shaarei Shomayim welcomes new cantor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's new cantor, Abraham Sultan, is also an ordained rabbi, not to mention a mohel and shochet.

But don't call him "Rabbi Sultan" at the shul. "I'm here to work together [with the rabbi] as a team," he said in an interview at the synagogue in late July.

The Modern Orthodox congregation is still in transition following the departure of Rabbi Moshe Shulman earlier this summer for a pulpit in St. Louis. Rabbi Asher Vale – a teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and director of Toronto's Orthodox beit din – is serving as interim rabbi.

Cantor Abraham Sultan

Sultan, a 38-year-old native of Rabat, Morocco, who immigrated to Canada with his family at age five and grew up in Montreal, joined the synagogue in April on a part-time basis, and took on full-time duties at the beginning of July. He is the only staff cantor at a Toronto Orthodox synagogue and will be welcomed officially, along with his family, at a celebratory Shabbat the weekend of Sept. 7.

Like his predecessor, Yaakov Motzen, Sultan comes to Toronto from Montreal's Adath Israel Poale Zedek. Sultan spent the past decade as cantor of the Montreal congregation, served as a hospital chaplain and taught high school Judaic studies at École Maïmonide. The multi-lingual cantor – who speaks French, English Hebrew, Spanish, Yiddish and Moroccan Arabic – has also served congregations in Malaga, Caracas, San Francisco and Jerusalem, where he was ordained.

The father of four boys ranging in age from seven to 13, Sultan received a BA in rabbinics and education from the now-defunct Yeshivat Midrash Sepharadi, which served both Ashkenazi and Sephardi students in Israel.

He started his career in Venezuela as assistant rabbi of the Caracas Sephardi community, head of the local kashrut organization, and cantor.

It wasn't until after he left the position because of unrest in the country that he met his Venezuelan-born wife Raquel, a preschool educator who will be teaching at Netivot HaTorah Day School this year. She was a classmate of Sultan's sister in Montreal.

At Shaarei Shomayim, the cantor believes that his role is not just to perform and serve as shaliach tzibur (messenger of the congregation), but to have a relationship with the congregational community. He favours congregational singing and says it's important to maintain the synagogue's established nusach, the basic melodies used in chanting the prayers.

However, when he sees a diverse group of worshippers, he tries to offer a "candy" to everyone, in the form of a tune they will recognize and appreciate.

"I think a cantor brings people closer to Judaism, because when you sing, you touch the heart."

Sultan, a lyric tenor who began his singing career as a child in the choir of Montreal's Spanish & Portuguese Synagogue, became a chazzan to perpetuate the legacy of his late grandfather, also Abraham Sultan, who was a cantor, rabbi, mohel and sofer (scribe) in Morocco. Sultan's father, who stepped in as breadwinner when his own father died, had dreamed of having a son who would become a cantor.

Years ago, when Sultan was a student in Israel, he was approached by an elderly man after davening at a local synagogue. The man said to him, "In my hometown, there was a friend of mine, Rabbi Abraham Sultan, and your voice reminds me of his."

Sultan called his father in Montreal as soon as Shabbat was over to share the emotional experience with him.

Now, at Shaarei Shomayim, the cantor is talking about instituting a monthly Friday night Carlebach-style service, like the one planned for Sept. 7.

"The greatness of Carlebach is that it's easy tunes, and if you don't know the words, you can just join in, say "ay, ay, ay" and "la, la, la, la… I think it's a great experience. It's very nice and warm."

Services should be "a great experience, an uplifting experience," he believes. They have to "flow, and finish not too late."

His goal for the upcoming High Holy Days is to finish Rosh Hashanah services by 1:15 p.m. As well, he is organizing a one-hour Rosh Hashanah afternoon service – "free, fast, fun" – on the second day of the holiday. It will be open to the community and will feature selected prayers and tunes, shofar-blowing and explanation of the prayers and rituals.

The Hungarian Jewish Memorial Association

Invites you to our annual memorial service

Sun., September 9, 2007–10:00am

Every year, at the Bathurst Lawn Cemetery, at the AHAVAT ACHIM section at the Martyr Memorial, we gather to keep alive in our collective memory and to commemorate the anniversary of the deportation of Hungarian Jews, with candle lighting and the recital of the mourners' Kaddish. Rabbi Landeszmann will preside.

We encourage and ask you to bring your children and grandchildren to participate and to keep this memory alive, as it is such an important part of our history.

WE MUST NEVER FORGET!

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Why be Jewish?

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

By RABBI ALAN W. BRIGHT

With the release this summer of the film A Mighty Heart, I was reminded once again of the final words of Daniel Pearl. Pearl, a respected journalist, was taken prisoner and brutally murdered by Al Qaeda in Pakistan. While his murder was a heinous and tragic act of anti-Semitism, his final words were a beautiful and powerful articulation of Jewish identity and Jewish pride. His words were, "My father is Jewish, my mother is Jewish, and I am Jewish." As we move into a new year, it's an appropriate time to examine what it means to say "I am Jewish."

While Pearl's murder may cause some to see the fragility of Jewish existence, I am not worried about the survival of Jews and Judaism. There will always be Jews. I am not concerned that we will die out, but rather that we will become irrelevant. Fewer Jews means that Judaism will have less of an impact on a world increasingly devoid of enduring values.

The Jewish people really shouldn't be here. We are so small, and we've been killed, expelled, marginalized and restricted. We could have passed from history without leaving a trace. We could have muddled our way through centuries without creating a treasure of Jewish literature and law. We could have survived without creating cures for many diseases. We could have could have played no role in communications, no role in the entertainment industry. Instead, we helped make our world a better place.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel once wrote, "The modern Jew is a messenger who forgot his message." The implication is that if we as Jews have forgotten who we are and why we are here, our survival as a people is meaningless. When we understand that we are messengers with a message, we will recognize that the question "Why be Jewish" and the question of how we can improve the quality of our Jewish lives are much more important than whether we survive.

In the past, we concentrated on how to fight anti-Semitism, how to rescue persecuted Jews, how to feed and clothe the poor, and how to gain political support for Israel. Our work in these areas is by no means done, yet these issues cannot be the foundation of our Jewish lives.

The philosopher Nietzsche noted, "He who has a why to live can bear any how." Our major problem is that many Jews lack the "why." If we want there to be another generation of Jews to fight anti-Semitism and support Israel, we had better teach our children why they should even bother leading Jewish lives.

Why be Jewish? Because the Jewish people has a sacred mission to "repair the world under God's rule." Because we as Jews are bidden to be a "light unto the nations." Because if we allow it to, Judaism can fill our lives with a holiness, a meaning, a joy that is attainable through religious observance and attaching ourselves to the rhythms of Jewish life.

Judaism has distinctive values that, when communicated to the world, reduce human suffering and help to extinguish evil. Judaism can teach us spiritual moral mindfulness, a way of living in this world that promotes joy inside us and encourages ethical actions and social justice. Living a Jewish life means joining a cause that is greater than ourselves. It means contributing to the betterment of the world. It means, as Rabbi David Wolpe writes, "Our true task is to draw the powers of goodness to the world."

Judaism is tied to the past, but it's also deeply concerned about what kind of future we will leave for future generations. If we connect ourselves and our children with faith, practice and tradition, and with confidence and faith in our ability to transmit a culture, religion and tradition that gives us optimism, virtues and vision, we will create a Judaism that looks to the future with hope and determination.

We need to embrace Judaism not just for what it can do for us, but for what it can do for all humanity. Daniel Pearl's final declaration "I am Jewish" was not just a statement of personal identity, it was also a statement of personal responsibility.

I pray that not only do we enjoy a Shanah Tovah Umetukah, a good and sweet new year, but a year in which we move the world closer to redemption.

Rabbi Alan Bright is spiritual leader of Shaare Zedek Congregation in Montreal.

Questions of the season

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Our lives don't follow a straight line. They turn and then turn again. This re-turn – known in Jewish tradition as tshuvah, also translated as repentance – plays out ritually and halachically in Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The two holidays, so close together in the calendar, are quite different in temperament and symbolism. Rosh Hashanah celebrates beginnings. In the words of the liturgy, it is "the birthday of the world" and also the first day of the Jewish year. It marks a new beginning for our emotional selves and our connectedness to the divine. (It is also, incidentally, around the time when children return to the classroom). We learn on this day that memory is a prerequisite to future imaginings. The Yom Hazikaron, or Day of Remembrance, teaches us that if we can become clear about our origins and hence our life purpose and mission, we can move forward. To be without grounding is to walk on air and, ultimately, to fall.

Yom Kippur, the Day of "At-One-Ment", although it reminds us of the past, of the glorious Temple service of the Kohen HaGadol, is essentially rooted in a vision of the end, that is, the day of our deaths. It's not an accident that we are commanded to wear a shroud (kittel), to refrain from physical necessities (eating, drinking, bathing, sexuality), and to meditate on our shadow-like existence on earth. Death and the possibility of immortality through cultivation of the soul and the admission of our failings are the persistent threads woven through this day.

Judaism, and Jewish education, should be about good questions as much as efficient answers. Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur offer up questions of their own that beckon to all who wish to hear and engage with them. Who am I? What is my ultimate value? How should I live my life, both in terms of my personal goals and in my interactions with others? What do I need to know to live successfully? Where do I start? Where does God fit in? Is a spiritual life possible amid the flurry of material strivings and distractions in my hurried and somewhat off-kilter schedule? Can I stop long enough in my endless turnings to plot a straight and true line towards my destiny? Where will I find the will, the courage, the grace to stay focused on that line? Who hinders me in this process? How do I repent of what I have done, my mistakes, my ill-considered decisions, my lazy deflections of reality, my wounded attacks on others? Where do I begin to look for the entranceway to the gate of repentance? Who can help me step over that threshold? What do I fear? Can I convert my inner dissatisfaction, my longstanding ennui, into energy and determination for the new life I want?

The Yamim Nora'im are about that long return from exile and existential loneliness toward the divine being whom we reach for tentatively, haltingly, to revive us from our living deaths.

As Rainer Maria Rilke writes: "We are all falling. This hand's falling too/all have this falling sickness none withstands/And yet there's always One whose gentle hands/this universal falling can't fall through."

Judaism and the environment

The Creation* by E.O. Wilson, W.H. Norton & Company.

Books

Bernard Baskin

Ecology is an urgent and immediate concern. But this many-sided problem isn't new – it goes back to biblical times. The need to protect the environment was clearly perceived by early Jewish legislators.

Biblical society was based on agriculture. Its ecological problem was to protect the soil against depletion at a time when artificial fertilizers and chemical soil enrichment were unknown. The laws for the sabbatical year (shmittah) were an ecological measure intended to provide "rest" and recovery for the soil.

"When you come into the land which I give you, the land shall keep a Sabbath to the Lord. Six years you shall sow your fields, and six years you shall prune your vineyard, and gather its fruit. But in the seventh year there shall be a Sabbath of solemn rest for the land, a Sabbath for the Lord; you shall not sow your field nor prune your vineyard, and gather its fruit. What grows of itself as a harvest you shall not reap, and the grapes of your undressed vine you shall not gather; it shall be a year of solemn rest for the land." (Leviticus 25:2-5)

Ecologists deplore the global implications of defoliation in war and its dire consequences. The biblical law prohibits the destruction of trees.

"When you besiege a city for a long time, making war against it, you shall not destroy its trees by wielding an axe against them; you shall not cut them down. Are the trees of the field men that they should be besieged by you? Only the trees which you know are not trees for food you may cut down that you may build siegeworks against the city that makes war with you, until it falls." (Deuteronomy 20:19)

The rabbis of the Talmud prohibited destroying or wasting anything that is useful and needed for sustaining life, especially diverting water (rivers, springs, etc.) in war or for private business.

In the Middle Ages and far into modern times, the streets of cities and towns were putrid with human waste poured into the gutters. This was not the case in the Jewish ghettos where the "anti-pollution" laws based on Deuteronomy 23:10 were observed.

The urgency of conserving the limited resources of our planet is now a matter of life and death – and so is the protection of our environment, including the stratosphere. The Jewish tradition has nothing of a technological nature to offer to the solution of these problems; however, it has stated them, defined them, and provides the ethical rational for ecology.

E.O. Wilson, the author of this slim volume, is a world-renowned evolutionary biologist. Unlike his many previous books that were addressed largely to fellow environmentalists, The Creation is a persuasive plea to religious-minded members of the community.

Wilson points out that half of all known species – "from the glorious tigers and elephants to the lowlier little things that run the world" – could be gone forever by the end of this century. There will be no lions left to lie down with the lambs.

Wilson insists that this baleful outlook should be recognized by religious leaders of every stripe and brought home to their congregants. He stresses that to protect the beauty of the earth and its prodigious variety of life forms should be a common goal regardless of differing religious beliefs.

A feature of this book is its emphasis on how to teach the love of nature, the basic elements of biology and the dangers to our environment to young and eager minds – the inheritors of the future.

This wise and timely work attempts to reach out to all concerned persons. His message is clear and urgent. "However science and religion wax and wane in the minds of men, there remains the earthborn, yet transcendental, obligation we are both morally bound to share."

The Jewish Highway

"You may plant your land for six years and gather its crops. But during the seventh year, you must leave it alone and withdraw from it." (Exodus 23:10-11) [tinyurl.com/3y95lf]

Sound simple? Not quite. Every seven years, residents of Israel are faced with a slew of restrictions based on the biblical commandment to leave the land fallow. As we mark the start of the Jewish New Year 5768 in a few weeks, we also usher in the shmittah year. Shmittah will have an impact on Israeli farmers, the country's economy, and on the eating habits of the followers of this commandment.

The restrictions are wide-ranging, complicated and controversial. Here are just three examples.

- Most watering, fertilizing, weeding and other essential field work are forbidden both commercially and at home.
- Produce that grows on its own may be eaten but cannot be sold.
- Shmittah produce must be treated with a level of sanctity. If a fruit cannot be entirely eaten, there are guidelines for how it may be disposed of. [tinyurl.com/2hcvsc] (If you have any questions about the observance of shmittah, please consult your rabbi.)

Because of the economic implications to the agricultural industry, rabbis granted certain leniencies in the early days of Zionism. Since shmittah restrictions apply only to Jewish-owned land within the biblical boundaries of the Land of Israel, farms were temporarily "sold" to non-Jews to allow farming. [tinyurl.com/2698yc] Those leniencies are not universally accepted and have come under fire on both religious and nationalistic grounds. Others continue to defend them today. [tinyurl.com/32wdr9]

Although shmittah has huge implications today, years ago it was more of a curiosity. In 1951, the State of Israel was marking its first shmittah and Time magazine described ceremonies as the year ended. "Pilgrims… cried out in jubilation, dancing and clapping their hands… The next morning Orthodox farmers went out to the land once more to plow their weed-choked fields… There were relatively few of them who had made the sacrifice which the Law called for. Israeli government statisticians estimated the total loss in produce at less than £30,000 ($84,000 US)." [tinyurl.com/26v9rr]

Dov Weiss remembers that year well. In The Seventh Year, he tells what it was like to farm – actually, to not farm – on his moshav that shmittah year. The real challenge facing them came at year's end when they had trouble finding wheat seed for the new crop. When they finally did, they couldn't get it sown until November. But because of that year's late rains, the moshav's wheat thrived, while neighbouring farms sprouted only small, weak crops. [tinyurl.com/239uvr]

But why all these rules? And why in the 21st century? Rabbi Asher Meir says it reminds us that "man is not the master of the world nor the source of blessing; God is. Our sabbatical rest, like our Shabbat rest, gives us a break from productive activity to remind ourselves that we are not in control. Shmittah is a lesson in Divine providence." [besr.org/library/shemitta.html]

Rabbi Zalman Posner adds, "This is a difficult test, undramatic, there is no heroic martyrdom involved. There is no reason for its fulfillment but faith in God, and without faith, its fulfillment is impossible." [tinyurl.com/yo4oc5] Rabbi Moshe Bryski puts it succinctly, "Gut-check time can happen in the office, at the bank or in the supermarket." [tinyurl.com/ys4yaq]

As the shmittah year approaches, stories have been popping up about how an Israeli market is looking to other sources to fill its supermarkets, including importing food from Cyprus [tinyurl.com/3d8kax], Jordan [tinyurl.com/2vm5qx] and even Gaza. [tinyurl.com/2p42f6] For the latest on shmittah in the news, go to the following link. [tinyurl.com/2pe3es]

So where does all this leave you? As mentioned in this column, there are no restrictions on planting, pruning and growing outside the borders of Israel. At the same time, there is no way for Jews outside Israel to merit from fulfilling the mitzvah of shmittah – until now. The organization Shomrei Shvi't is offering for sale small tracts of land that will lie fallow during the upcoming year. For the sum of $180 (US), you can purchase one year's ownership of a plot 1.35 metres square – in which absolutely nothing will happen. [shviit.com]

50-year reunion for Harbord Collegiate grads

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Students who attended Harbord Collegiate Institute between 1952 and 1957 are gearing up for the school's 50th anniversary reunion on Oct. 13.

The school, built in 1892, boasted a 95 per cent Jewish population 50 years ago. Even as families began to move north, many students stayed at their beloved downtown high school.

"There were just so many people who left their hearts at Harbord," said Carol (Davis) Bloom, one of the event organizers.

Bloom has stayed in touch with about 10 people from her 1957 graduating class of approximately 110. She is part of a group of women who have met every Monday night for the past 50 years.

"We were close then, and we're close now. We've gone through the whole life cycle – a couple of life cycles, actually. It started out as a bridge group," Davis explained, but conversation always overrode the game.

"We haven't taken the cards out in 48 years," she said.

Bernie Liebgott, another event organizer, remembers Harbord as special because of the connection between the Jewish students.

"It was a crazy time. We had just come from public schools where we had to do the Lord's Prayer every day, we had to read the Bible… at Harbord they didn't do those things," he said of his own experience.

The kinship the Jewish students felt was really evident at "the Y" – now the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. It was the hub of social activity, said Liebgott, a professor in the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine.

> School was 'the greatest experience that anybody could ever have'

At school, students, mostly first-generation Canadians, would speak Yiddish in the halls so that the mainly gentile staff wouldn't understand, he said.

"Things were a little bit tense," he said of the teachers. "You'd get the odd remark about 'our people,' that sort of thing, but mostly they were fair. It was a different time. Teachers could indulge in corporal punishment," Liebgott said.

"The fact that [the teachers] weren't Jewish was never an issue. It just didn't matter," said grad Martin Goldfarb.

"The Jewish holidays were sacrosanct. The school was open, but nothing happened 90 per cent of the time."

Goldfarb, a principal at Goldfarb Intelligence Marketing, CEO of Goldfarb Corporation and member of the Order of Canada, said Harbord was more of a club than a school.

"Students understood each other and knew each other. Most of them were Jewish. You had this innate understanding of our values and standards for behaviour, what was expected, what was not expected. The teachers understood it too."

Harbord is known for some prestigious graduates, including the comedy duo Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster; Stephen Lewis, the former UN envoy for AIDS/HIV in Africa and now founder of the Stephen Lewis Foundation; and Dr. Charles Best, co-discoverer of insulin.

Most of the 1957 graduates went into professions like medicine, dentistry, law and accountancy.

Helen Freedhoff (Henchy Goodman) stood out as a female who didn't go directly into teaching, as many of the girls did, but headed into an academic physics career. When she started teaching physics, she said, it was to all-male classes. She is still a physics professor at York University.

"In high school it never occurred to me that I would have to play dumb to get dates," she recalled.

"Nobody ever really discouraged me. The teachers really encouraged me, and nobody taught me that there was anything wrong with having a career."

Stan Kates, who graduated at 16 and was student council president, opened his own advertising agency at the age of 24.

"Stan, the super salesman, will enter commerce and finance and then sell refrigerators to the Eskimos," his yearbook bio stated 50 years ago.

He is now president of Kates Advertising and chair of the Kates Marketing Group, the largest real estate marketer in Canada.

"Harbord, for us who went there in the '50s and '60s, was probably the greatest experience that anybody could ever have," Kates said. "It was an exciting time frame. So many of the kids who went through that period did so well in life. It was a tremendous training ground for us."

For more information or to order tickets for the Oct. 13 reunion, visit www.harbordreunion57.com or call Carol Bloom at 416-491-2845.

Sar-El volunteers boost Israeli morale

"Israelis feel isolated and they take solace from the fact that someone from outside Israel came and does something," he added.

Montrealer Jack Bordan sensed the morale-boosting effect as well. During one of his many Sar-El stints, IDF soldiers asked him how much he was paid for his work. When he told them he had volunteered, paid for his own ticket and kicked in a $100 registration fee to boot, they couldn't believe it.

"At first they think you're crazy. Then they say, 'Kol hakavod' [it deserves respect]," Bordan said.

The vice-president of Sar-El Canada, Bordan said by volunteering, "you feel you are actually doing something for Israel in a hands-on way. People give money, but this is another contribution, even if it's trivial like picking up litter."

Bordan's first Sar-El experience took place during the 1991 Gulf War, and he vividly recalls wearing a gas mask in a sealed room on an army base during a Scud missile attack. "You really experience the same things as the Israelis," he said. "That was an experience that marked us."

Most Sar-El visits are, of course, more mundane. Volunteers are met at the airport and taken to supply or maintenance bases, where they are given tedious work. On Bordan's last trip in October, the volunteers continued the cleanup after the Hezbollah war, stocking warehouse shelves and sorting equipment.

Volunteers spend Monday to Thursday on base and have the weekends to themselves. A highlight of the day is dressing in their khaki uniforms and participating in an 8 a.m. flag-raising ceremony.

Most volunteers are Jewish, although about 20 per cent are Christian.

Since its inception 25 years ago, Sar-El has attracted more than 100,000 volunteers from 30 countries. The Canadian office of Sar-El was established 21 years ago, and it sends an average of 150 volunteers to Israel each year. France and the United States are the two largest sources of Sar-El volunteers.

Bronfman student believes in interdenominational dialogue

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After five weeks in Israel this summer on a Bronfman Youth Fellowship, Arielle Lewis has a renewed understanding and love of Israel, increased respect for other Jewish denominations, and a desire to become involved in the greater Jewish community.

The 17-year-old, now entering Grade 12 at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus in Richmond Hill, was the only Canadian among 26 North American students who took part in the program, now in its 21st year. The program, funded by the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, is designed to develop future community leaders committed to Jewish unity.

A graduate of Netivot HaTorah Day School who attended Ulpanat Orot for two years, Lewis is an avid reader who is involved in her synagogue (Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation), the Bnei Akiva youth movement and various school committees.

Her long skirts and the sleeves that extend past her elbows attest to her Jewish observance, as does her being shomeret negiah (not having physical contact with members of the opposite sex).

Lewis' Orthodoxy means a lot to her, she said in a recent interview. However, her outlook is pluralistic, and last year she acted on her desire to gain a broader perspective on Judaism by taking part in Genesis, a summer program at Brandeis University that combines study, arts, volunteerism and community-building.

"I thought that going into this environment would strengthen my Orthodox beliefs, and I was right," she said. "It was also incredible because that was the first time I was meeting non-Orthodox Jews my own age that aren't in my [extended] family. The respect I received for what I did [in terms of Jewish observance] was incredible. I was shocked. I felt really empowered."

She also discovered that many of her non-Orthodox peers were "very connected to their Judaism and very passionate about what they do," as well as in some cases very spiritual.

The experience confirmed for her that switching from an Orthodox girls' school to a pluralistic Jewish high school would be a good move, although her level of observance places her in a small minority, she said.

Her friends, however, represent the spectrum of Jewish observance and affiliation.

"After Genesis, I got really inspired to be more involved in the pluralistic community.

"I thought Bronfman would be an amazing stepping stone to get me more involved, because it's a leadership program, and it's in Israel."

Lewis had found her strong Zionism shaken during her first trip to Israel, a family bar mitzvah trip the summer after Grade 9.

Instead of the spiritually uplifting experience she was anticipating, she became disheartened by the conflict between Orthodox nationalist Zionists and secular Israelis over Israel's withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank. She had been taught, she said, that Israel was the homeland for the Jews and that all Jews are family.

"I guess it was a rude awakening," she says now.

She feels she needed the different perspective offered by the Bronfman program, where participants meet with Israeli and Palestinian teenagers and listen to speakers from across the political spectrum.

Arielle Lewis

"I felt this is really what Israel is about," Lewis said. "Right now I love Israel because I love the struggles that it goes through. There's so much that went into that country."

As in relationships between people, "not everything is happy and great all the time," she said. "It's the bad parts you overcome that make the relationship even stronger."

Also, she said, she "learned so much about other denominations and gained so much more respect for them."

Now that she is back home, Lewis has to figure out what type of community service she will take on for her mandatory program follow-up. There are also two upcoming post-program seminars she plans to attend.

Although she hasn't yet settled on a future career – "My curse is that I'm interested in everything" – Lewis said her biggest interest now is Judaism, and that she would like to spend a year in Israel after high school.

While she understands why some Orthodox Jews "want to shelter themselves" from non-Orthodox influences, "I think interdenominational dialogue and being together with other Jews are so important. No matter how observant we are, we are all Jews. There are so many threats in the world, so many bigger things going on than interdenominational conflicts."

As well, she notes, "if you seclude yourself, you prevent the other denominations from seeing the beauty that exists in Orthodoxy."

THE GERALD SCHWARTZ/HEATHER REISMAN FALL 2007 LECTURE SERIES AT HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

The God Delusion — Or The God Reality?

Is belief in God irrational, a product of childlike fantasies and wishes? Or, might belief in God be based on something real? Some assert that religious belief is trumped up — a series of myths that make people feel better, disguising the chaos at the heart of life. For others, religion is a comprehensive world view that brings satisfaction to daily life. Four interesting thinkers, one a devout atheist, and the other three serious believers, share their personal views and experiences about belief, God and their lives.

All lectures will take place on Tuesdays at 8 p.m.

Jerusalem Foundation pitches fields of dreams

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Steve Solomon came to Toronto last week from Israel and took in a Blue Jays game. He hopes that soon Jerusalem natives get to watch their own team in a new stadium as part of a proposed multi-sport complex in the Holy City.

It's a dream he shared with investors in Toronto last week.

Though the Jays lost 6-4 to Oakland, Solomon, the Israel-based director of the Canada desk for the Jerusalem Foundation, an organization dedicated to improving the quality of life in Jerusalem through education, the arts, social programming and sports, hopes he threw out a winning pitch.

Before the Aug. 21 game at the Rogers Centre, Solomon, along with the foundation's Greater Toronto Area director, Ian Leventhal, arranged a private meeting with high-profile members of the Toronto business community to promote the creation of a 25-acre sports complex on a parcel of undeveloped land in the municipality's northern Lifta Valley.

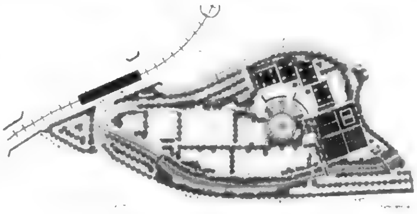
Present were Blue Jays' president and CEO, Paul Godfrey; an executive vice-president with RBC, Charles Coffey; Maccabi Canada Ontario chairman, Bob Guest; and accountant Joel Rubinovich, principal of Rubinovich Shoib LLP.

"It's still a concept at this point, but we believe this project will have a broad appeal to [the Jewish community]," Solomon told The CJN as he prepared for his inaugural meeting with potential investors.

Tentatively called the "Sportek," the hypothetical sports complex would house soccer fields (professional sized and children's sized), basketball courts, an inline skating rink, tennis, volleyball and handball courts, an exercise facility and a baseball diamond.

The latter may be the fulcrum on which the whole project rests.

According to Solomon, the fledgling Israel Baseball League (IBL), currently a six-team, semi-pro organization without a Jerusalem-based team, believes the Sportek would be a perfect fit for a future squad – if a field can be built.



Artist's conception of the Sportek
[Jerusalem Foundation photo]

Solomon believes the allure of naming rights and advertising potential would be a heavy draw for a potential IBL investor as well.

Solomon could not say how much the project might cost, but estimated it might require tens of millions of dollars to complete.

"The whole purpose of [the Canada trip] is to get sufficient interest and support to begin the project," he said.

That interest seems to have been piqued.

Leventhal said the guests at the pitch session, held in Godfrey's private box at the Rogers Centre, voiced support and were "very receptive" to the idea.

Though no monetary commitments have yet been made, Leventhal said Godfrey will visit the proposed site this October to see the parcel of undeveloped land for himself.

"Most investors want to see what they're investing in first," Leventhal said. "But this presentation got us off to a great start."

The foundation envisions the Sportek as a place where Jerusalemites of all stripes can gather to play and promote peaceful coexistence and break down stereotypes between Arab, Christian and Jewish youth.

"Jerusalem is the poorest of Israel's large cities and has a heavy concentration of children from lower income families," Solomon said. "Having a municipal land setting to release stress would be a great outlet for these kids."

In his presentation Solomon said the existence of an accessible, community sports complex would go a long way to alleviating frayed nerves in "a city where tempers run high and the powder keg threatens to explode at the slightest provocation."

Though it doesn't yet have guaranteed funding from any level of Israeli government, Solomon said his talks with federal officials have so far been positive, though he remains pragmatic about domestic funding chances.

"[Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert's government has recognized Jerusalem as a priority," he said. "But in Israel, what can be a priority today may not be in six months from now," he lamented, referring to the country being under the constant spectre of war.

Regardless, the foundation has set an ambitious time line to start ground-breaking on the new complex, looking at the end of 2008 as a possible start to building.

"It's our 2008 lead project," Solomon said, adding that he'll return to Canada often over the next year to continue drumming up support for the Sportek.

In the past, the Jerusalem Foundation has worked hand in hand with Jerusalem's municipal government, helping raise funds for city landmarks such as the Jerusalem Music Centre, Teddy Kollek Stadium, the University Botanical Gardens of Jerusalem and the YMCA Peace Kindergarten for Jewish and Arab children, among others.

Informal Jewish education 'a growing field," CAJE presenter says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Daniel Held, the 25-year-old director of student activities at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus in Richmond Hill, is at the forefront of three apparently nascent trends that bode well for the future of Jewish education.

His relative youth is unusual in the field; according to statistics from the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE) – whose recent annual conference Held attended in St. Louis, Mo. – more than half the teachers in Jewish congregational and day schools are older than 48. However, there were dozens of young teachers and graduate students among the approximately 1,200 conference participants.

UJA Federation comes to the aid of survivors seeking restitution

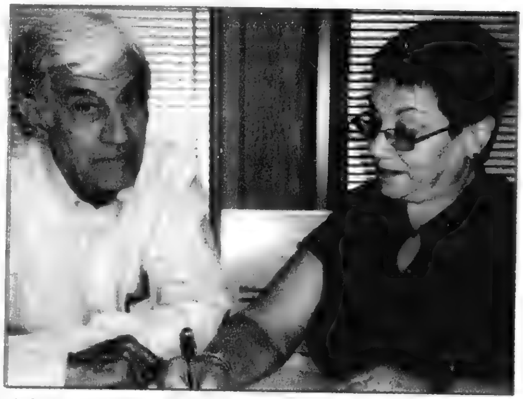
Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto takes over from URO

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

At the time of the 2001 Census there were 28,000 Jewish senior citizens living in the Greater Toronto Area, close to one half of whom (12,815) were Holocaust survivors.

So, when the United Restitution Organization (URO) – an independent world-wide legal aid organization which assists victims of Nazi persecution to submit financial claims against the German and Austrian governments – decided to close down its last Canadian office, UJA Federation quickly stepped in.

While URO's Toronto office – housed on the third floor of the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services - did, in fact, close on March 31 this year, the service re-opened seamlessly and without interruption the very next day. This time it was under the auspices of UJA Federation's Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST), part of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage.



Holocaust survivor Elly Gotz (l) gets a helping hand from Dora Elzbet, a restitution claims officer with Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto's Restitution Service.

"After URO decided to shut down their offices across North America, including Toronto, it was incumbent on us to do whatever we could to keep this essential service operational," said UJA Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "Our community owes these survivors of the Shoah a deep debt of gratitude as it was those very same survivors who, in rebuilding their own lives, helped create a vibrant Jewish community here in Toronto. We simply could not - and would not - let these important members of our community be stranded with no recourse."

"This is an office that specializes in overcoming barriers," said Elly Gotz, a survivor of the Dachau concentration camp who, thanks to the efforts of JIST, recently received a social security pension for his forced labour in the Kovno Ghetto. "There is such a morass of legal difficulties in getting money from Germany. Only the knowledge and skills of this office make it possible. If this service was not here, it would be virtually impossible to succeed in our quest for restitution."

Without the assistance of UJA Federation, Toronto-area Holocaust survivors like Gotz would have had no alternative but to seek advice on restitution matters from the URO's two other remaining offices in New York and Israel.

"In 2001 JIST helped survivors complete forms for slave labour compensation. Having JIST - with support from the Holocaust Centre of Toronto - take over the functions of URO was the next logical step," said Susan Jackson, executive director, Latner Centre.

"It is wonderful that UJA Federation has stepped forward," said Nate Leipciger, co-chair, Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada. "Working with people locally, survivors and their families can speak with someone face-to-face. It would be very hard to discuss such painful and personal experiences with an unknown voice at the other end of a long-distance call."

Perspective

Myths and facts about fair funding for education

By DR. SEYMOUR EPSTEIN

In recent letters and articles critical of public support for faith based schools that meet provincial standards, there is a perception that those who favour such funding do not also support the public school system. Nothing could be further from the truth. Indeed we believe that faith-based schools need to be included in the public system in order to make it a more "public" system of education.

During the course of debate on this issue there have been many myths perpetrated. These deserve to be confronted and factually addressed.

Dr. Seymour Epstein

Myth # 1 – Funding for faith-based schools violates liberal democratic principles.

Liberal democratic principles permit and require public funding of qualifying faith-based schools. In other Canadian provinces and most western jurisdictions outside of the USA, public funds are given to faith-based schools. In fact, even in the United States where the separation of church and state is a constitutional principle, there is a great deal of government assistance to faith-based schools.

Myth # 2 – Funding faith-based schools will confer benefits to religious organizations that are not available to non-religious organizations.

Inclusive Public Education provides those in society for whom religion is all-important with the benefits of general education which are available to the non-religious. No academic logic can turn around the fact that a small percentage of faith-based parents are not receiving the full educational rights they are paying for with their taxes. Ontarians understand that in the year 2007 we cannot discriminate against faith communities. As a responsible pluralistic society that honours and treasures our faith communities we cannot simply "grin and bear" such a serious inequity.

Myth # 3 – The province already has the power to supervise education at faith-based schools without public funding.

Although most Jewish day schools already adhere to provincial standards, by law, a private elementary school in Ontario does not have to do much more than obey certain fire codes. Provincial inspection of private secondary schools offering a diploma varies greatly in intensity and depth, mostly at the discretion of the school itself. An inclusive public system would provide universal accountability and oversight to ensure that what is taught at faith-based schools conforms to provincial regulations and Canadian values.

Myth # 4 – Public funding for Jewish day schools will lead to academic mediocrity.

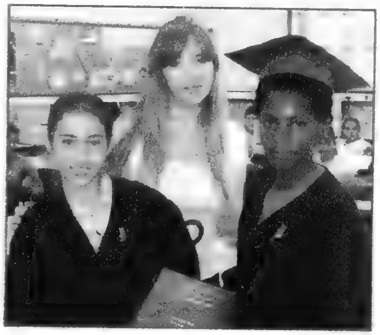
There is no evidence that government-funded faith-based schools tend towards mediocrity; not here in Canada and not throughout the world. Clearly, some fear that religious education goes against the grain of liberal society in that it divides more than it unifies. For this, too, there is no empirical evidence. Those of us who believe in and support public education but also want it to be completely inclusive are convinced by what we have seen elsewhere. Children who are reared in one specific environment can more easily appreciate the values of another atmosphere.

What I believe, as a Jewish educator deeply rooted in my own culture, its literature, and its values, and equally devoted to Canadian pluralism is that my perspective allows me to look in the eyes of any other Canadian or citizen of the world and appreciate profoundly how they see the world from their own individual perspective. Canada has always been proud of the mosaic rather than the melting pot, and in a mosaic each colour is magnified by the others around it.

Dr. Seymour Epstein is senior vice-president, The Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Jewish Agency Enrichment Fund for Children and Youth



JAFI's Enrichment Fund for Children and Youth is giving Sderot high school students another chance.

From sports activities to environmental studies, about 50,000 children are participating in a variety of enrichment programs thanks to the Jewish Agency's (JAFI) Enrichment Fund for Children and Youth. The young participants come from 36 local authorities, located in Northern Israel as well as the Western Negev, including Sderot and the Gaza perimeter.

Following last summer's war with Lebanon, it became evident that children in these areas would need long-term rehabilitation towards healing their traumas. JAFI – UJA Federation's overseas partner - turned to United Jewish Communities (UJC) to fund programs during and after school for these children.

The Enrichment Fund is partially supporting the To Sderot With Love campaign which enabled thousands of children in Sderot and the Gaza Perimeter to enjoy summer activities in safe areas.

Through the Enrichment Fund, high school students from Sderot were given another opportunity to learn for their matriculation exams. Due to the intensity of Kassam missile attacks during the school term, many had trouble focusing on their studies.

In addition, the dedicated teachers and staff of a special education school in the region enjoyed a day off to recharge their batteries.

Jewish Toronto reaches out to the people of Peru

UJA Federation establishes Earthquake Relief Fund

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Shortly after a massive 8.0-magnitude earthquake rocked Peru on August 15, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto responded by establishing the Peru Earthquake Relief Fund.

Proceeds will be distributed to victims - regardless of religion - by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). The JDC is working with other disaster relief agencies including IsraAid, which sent an Israeli medical team to Peru last week.

So far, more than 500 people have been reported killed, close to 2,000 injured, and tens of thousands are homeless as a result of the quake.

The JDC has a century-old history of providing relief to those in need. It collected $19.6 million for the relief effort following the tsunami in Southeast Asia in 2004 and $800,000 for the Pakistani earthquake in 2005.

"Natural disasters are quite indiscriminate and, be it Jew or non-Jew, the amount of human loss in Peru today is so very sad," said UJA Federation board chair David Engel. "We are fortunate to be the conduit for Toronto's generous Jewish community, giving people the opportunity to reach out to the families of those killed, or to those who have been injured or displaced by this tragedy. This is simply UJA Federation honouring its ongoing tradition of tikun olam, repairing the world."

According to the Jerusalem Post, there had been no injuries reported in the 3,000 member Jewish community in Lima nor to the 130 or so Israelis now in Peru.

After the Second World War, most members of Peru's Jewish community moved to Lima where they were able to establish a few key institutions including a Jewish school which houses 80% of the Jewish community's children. Three synagogues – one Ashkenazi and two Sephardi – were also built, as well as two homes for the Jewish elderly.

An injured boy drinks milk as he sits among other injured at hospital in Ica, 350 kms south of Lima, the day after a massive 8.0-magnitude earthquake rocked Peru on August 15. The powerful earthquake devastated several Peruvian cities killing at least 500 people and forcing the government to declare a state of emergency. (Photo by /AFP/Getty Images)

Even though the Jewish community has been dwindling since 1970 when it reached a peak of 5,200 members, Jews still own many businesses in Peru.

One of those business owners is Toronto's Marvin Zeifman, 52. Zeifman, the owner of Kaita Natural Health Products and the H Wood Flooring Company – travels to Peru every six to eight weeks on business, something he's been doing for 30 years.

"Our offices in Lima are housed in a brand new four-storey office building which, like all new buildings there, are built up to earthquake standards," says Zeifman, who will be heading back to Peru in early September. "When the earthquake hit, our employees – around 50 of them – ran out of the building to the parking lot where all the cars were rocking back and forth. I was caught in an earthquake in Colombia 15 years ago and, believe me, when the ground shakes, you can't quite believe it."

TanenbaumCHAT graduate proud to lead fundraising push

By JONATHAN AIN
UJA FEDERATION

When Jordan Gnat speaks about his years as a student at TanenbaumCHAT on Toronto's Wilmington Avenue, his face lights up as though he were speaking more of a beloved child than a high school alma mater.

"I loved TanenbaumCHAT; it's such a great school and such a special place," said Gnat, in a recent interview with Jewish Toronto after touring the site of the Kimel Family Education Centre, TanenbaumCHAT's new branch, opening this September at the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in York Region.

The campus is an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, which is both creating and revitalizing Jewish life on three campuses throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

Gnat, 35, began his involvement with the school over five years ago when he was asked to join the school's board and later the school's executive.

Fundraising was a natural evolution of Gnat's involvement and the school's pressing need to find more space to accommodate a burgeoning number of applicants and upgraded amenities to compete with other private schools.

"TanenbaumCHAT's student population has doubled in the last ten years," said Gnat. "A great many were coming from York Region, and the school knew it needed a branch north of Steeles. Eventually, the school rented a former elementary school on Wright Street in Richmond Hill, but that was always supposed to be temporary."

A more permanent solution evolved in 2001 when, through the Tomorrow Campaign, UJA Federation offered the chance to build a new branch on the Lebovic Campus.

Gnat recalled when he was first asked to take on a leadership role in helping to raise the millions of dollars necessary to create a world-class high school in York Region and re-develop the Wilmington Campus.

"I was approached to chair the TanenbaumCHAT Community Campaign and was quite excited about the opportunity," said Gnat. "I felt strongly that this was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to be a pioneer and it was an opportunity I could not turn away from. I knew one day in 20 or 30 years that I'd be able to drive by this incredible new building with my kids and say, 'I was a part of that.' How often does a chance like that come around?"

Jordan Gnat

From the start, Gnat was enthusiastic about the school's location. "To be the first building on the Lebovic Campus is a privilege. With the growth of the Jewish community north of Steeles, the location was a natural," he said.

According to Gnat, the integration of facilities on the Lebovic Campus would place the school on par with some of North America's most distinguished post-secondary institutions.

"TanenbaumCHAT has always held the academic gold standard by which other private schools were compared. With the new Kimel Family Education Centre, now it can compete in terms of facilities as well," he added, referring to some of Toronto's other top private schools. "With swimming pools, a theatre, a skating rink and all the rest, this school is second to none. Combining the resources of the other facilities on the Lebovic Campus is just strong vision on the part of UJA Federation and a brilliant use of community resources."

Human rights complaint accuses JNF of racism

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In recent years, the Jewish National Fund (JNF), the organization famous for those blue tin tzedakah boxes, planting trees in Israel and leasing Israeli land to Jews, has been no stranger to controversy and opposition.

In 1998, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights wrote a report on Israel and concluded that because its lands are "chartered to benefit Jews exclusively," the JNF practises an "institutionalized form of discrimination."

In 2005, Israel's attorney general, Menachem Mazuz, ruled that the Israel Land Authority (ILA) – which has been leasing JNF land to Jews on the JNF's behalf in accordance with the JNF's covenant since 1962 – should cut ties with the organization because it excludes Arab Israelis from leasing JNF property. Mazuz considered the practice discriminatory.

And earlier this month, Ronald Saba, a Palestinian Canadian and the editor of an online magazine called Montreal Planet Magazine, which features articles for the Palestinian community in Montreal, filed a complaint concerning the JNF with the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC).

Saba filed the complaint against the "Government of Canada for violating the Canadian Human Rights Act and Canada Revenue Agency Policy Statement CPS-021 by subsidizing racial discrimination through granting and maintaining charitable status for the Jewish National Fund." The complaint also cites the 1998 UN committee report and the 2005 ruling by Mazuz.

But Joe Rabinovitch, executive vice-president of JNF Canada, said that, unfortunately, these kinds of complaints are not uncommon.

"I've seen this 100 times in 100 different ways," Rabinovitch said.

"Every year, without fail, we get two or three of these [complaints], and they also send them out to every MP in Canada, and the fact is, there is no use arguing with them, because there is no common ground on which we can argue," he added.

"These are the same people who demonstrate in front of our Negev dinners, these are the same people who claim discrimination, these are the same people who say there should only be one state and it should be Palestine."

He added that responding to these complaints is a waste of time, because each one thus far has been dismissed by the CHRC, and when Rabinovitch spoke with The CJN last week, he hadn't even received any notice about this complaint.

Although Rabinovitch doesn't pay any mind to complaints like these, his organization has had to deal with the aftermath of Mazuz's 2005 ruling.

But Rabinovitch doesn't agree with Mazuz's assessment of JNF practice. He explained that in 1901, the JNF was established to buy land with money raised throughout the Diaspora. Today, it owns about 13 per cent of Israeli land, where about 70 per cent of the population lives.

"What happened after 1948, after the War of Independence, many Arabs left, and after three or four years there was a lot of abandoned land. The government then put [the abandoned land] up for auction, and we bid and paid the highest price for some of this land."

He said that when the ILA was established to administer public land, including JNF land, an agreement stipulated that JNF land would be held "in perpetuity for the Jewish people… If anyone wanted to build on that land, or lease that land, they wanted to make sure that they were Jewish. This is what went to the courts in Israel and this is what the attorney general ruled as discrimination."

Earlier this month, a bill called the Jewish National Fund Law, which would allow the ILA to continue to lease land owned by the JNF only to Jews, was endorsed 64-16 in its first Knesset reading.

Rabinovitch said the JNF practice is similar to Israel's Law of Return, which gives Jews the immediate right to settle in Israel and gain citizenship.

"There are many Jewish organizations that feel that it is discriminatory and there are other Jewish organizations that feel it is not discriminatory, because the Vatican owns land that is only for Catholics and the Arab organization that controls land in Jerusalem, [known as the Waqf] has land that is only for Arabs. However, some people feel that we shouldn't be compared to these other organizations, because Israel is a democratic country and it should be open to everybody."

He said it's hard to predict what the future holds for the JNF, because a number of different proposals are on the table.

One is that if the government rules non-Jews are eligible to lease JNF land, it could decide to compensate the JNF by giving it land in the Negev. The JNF has said it hopes to settle 250,000 Jews in the southern region within five to 10 years.

Another possibility, Rabinovitch said, is that the JNF could become a private organization and end all ties with the ILA, allowing it to do whatever it wants with its land.

"This is all speculation, but in actual fact, the matter is still under debate in Israel, under a lot of discussion, creating a lot of intensity among different Jewish groups and whatever the end result will be, we will follow along," Rabinovitch said.

He said he isn't worried, despite the complaints being filed against it by Canadian citizens, that the JNF will ever lose it's charitable status.

"We conform 100 per cent to Canadian law. In terms of following Canadian law, we're more Catholic than the Pope" he said with a laugh.

"We've made sure that everything is done according to the law and it's done according to the laws that the Canadian Revenue Agency imposes, so we have no concern."

Canada summer camp experience for Israeli victims ends

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Israeli Victims of War (IVOW) is a Canadian non-profit organization that brings Israeli children to Canada for summer camp.

The children IVOW sponsors have family members who have suffered because of war and terrorism. Last week, with the end of this year's four-week summer camp getaway, IVOW celebrated another successful year.

IVOW was founded in 1984, and thanks to donations from both Canadian and Israeli communities, it has given hundreds of war-torn children the opportunity to come together with their peers and experience a summer they'll never forget.

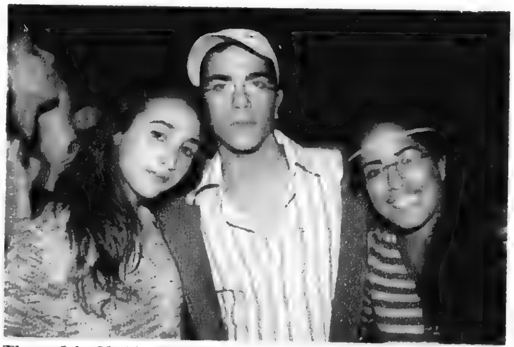
This year, the group consisted of 90 children aged 12 to 14 who have been victims of war themselves, or have someone in their immediate family who was seriously injured or killed during military service or a terrorist attack.

IVOW arranged for the children to come to Canada to spend four weeks at a Jewish overnight summer camp.

And to ensure that they would be sent back to Israel on a high note, Max Benaim, who has been a Sephardi Jewish community volunteer for decades, organized the IVOW farewell banquet at Petah Tikvah Anshe Castilla Congregation, for the sixth year in a row.

Benaim pulled out all the stops for the "future of Israel."

"The children we are hosting this evening are no ordinary children. They represent the future of our nation and will eventually protect and safeguard the principles we all hold dear to our hearts," Benaim said.



Three of the 90 children who were brought to Canada by IVOW pose on the dance floor at Petah Tikvah Congregation. [Joe Cohen photo]

As a thank you to the children who "exemplify the values of courage and strength," all those in attendance at the banquet welcomed the children with a standing ovation that broke into a horah.

The children clearly enjoyed the food, music and the event in general. The bond forged between the kids – who stood arm in arm at one point on the dance floor to sing along to some of the hottest tracks from Israel – was unmistakable.

Ori Nissani, 14, from Kfar Saba, was a participant who spent his four weeks at Camp B'nai Brith of Montreal.

In broken English, he spoke of his father who was injured during military service, when a missile landed near him.

He said that the shrapnel from the missile injured his father's leg.

Nissani said that he was grateful to IVOW for providing him with the opportunity to come to Canada.

"It was very fun and I met a lot of friends, and I want to say thank you to them."

Limrod Ozery, 22, Nissani's counsellor, said he was a camper himself 10 years ago.

He said when a family friend heard that IVOW was in search of counsellors for the program, he decided to apply.

Ozery said that this is an important program because it gives the children a release from their realities at home.

"In Israel, there is a lot of stress on the kids, and they come from families that are victims of terror and some of them from war. Some of the kids themselves are victims."

He also said that Israel doesn't offer anything like this to children.

"Summer camp is something we don't have in Israel. We have youth groups, but we don't have something where they go and sleep in cabins and be away from their parents for a month," Ozery said.

Toronto co-ordinator of IVOW, Fred Stoppel, briefly spoke at the banquet on behalf of the organization and the founder, Moshe Borek, who was also in attendance.

"In five or six years, these children will be our soldiers. This is an important program, this is an important cause," Stoppel said.

"I hope that one day, this dinner will not be necessary and that peace will flourish in Eretz Yisrael. But there remains a responsibility to heed the calls of duty and help every Jewish child in any way that we can," Benaim said.

Teachers deserve more money and respect

Also, while most Jewish teachers are women, a "good number" of the younger teachers and students at the conference were males who see themselves as important role models, showing children that men as well as women value education, according to a JTA report.

And as an educator focusing on informal Jewish education, Held said he is in a growing field. "We're no longer simply teaching curriculum," he said. "We're teaching students."

He said there are now more than 20 informal Jewish educators on staff at Jewish high schools in North America.

From a less positive standpoint, a familiar refrain at the conference was that teachers in Jewish schools must be paid more money and respect.

However, says Eric Golombek, one of 10 Canadian educators among the approximately 1,200 conference attendees in St. Louis earlier this month, there "really is a significant difference" in Canada, particularly Toronto.
